pendio' was constructed out of the 'Vita' by some later writer. Boccaccio's life of Dante is the main source of all the information regarding the poet contained in the other biographies. He is, for instance (as is well known), the only authority for saying that Beatrice bore the family name of Portinari, and in his unfinished lectures or commentary upon Dante he gives other details concerning her. Lionardo Aretino makes no mention of her whatever; and Filelfo totally disbelieved in her existence. He appears to be the first author (if we except certain startling phrases and arguments in Alighieri's own writings) who definitely adopted this view, which in the current century has been often maintained, and, Dr. Moore thinks, with an increasing number of adherents. He is himself, however, a decided believer in the real Beatrice Portinari, and of course in the substantial accuracy of the 'Vita Nova.' The brief life by Filippo Villani is written in Latin; the chief value of it, as apart from Boccaccio's narrative, is in the detailed account of Dante's death, caused chiefly by the harshness with which he was treated by the Venetians when sent on an embassy to them. Lionardo Aretino (properly named Bruni) wrote principally with a view to supplementing, by an account of Alighieri's public position and employments, the lightness, as he considered it, of the personal or anecdotic narrative of Boccaccio. This writing of Lionardo is pronounced to be

"the work of a serious and intelligent historian, who avoids repeating gossip, and for the most part also mere current tradition—possibly some might say he does this too rigidly, alarmed by the warning example of Boccaccio; one too who knows how to make use of letters, archives, and other documents, in order to verify or test his statements; one finally who can secure both these merits without becoming dull, since his work is often enlivened by gleams of humour and touches of sympathy."

Manetti's life, composed in Latin, is much longer than Lionardo's, but far less important; it works up Lionardo and Boccaccio, and does little else, unless we should accept as new matter the very severe strictures bestowed upon Dante's wife Gemma, in which also, however, Manetti had been preceded, but in a milder and much less positive tone, by Boccaccio. It is worth noting that Manetti professed to have been incited to write the life of Dante (as likewise of Petrarca and Boccaccio) partly by a wish to extend among the learned the fame of these heroes of literature, as yet confined chiefly to the vulgar—the "plebecula." The life by Filelfo has only once (1828) been published, and is an extremely rare book. This Filelfo was the son of the more renowned Francesco. It adds little to our knowledge of the subject, unless it be by the repudiation (already referred to) of a real Beatrice, and by a panegyric of Gemma as excessive as was Manetti's abuse.

The chapter of Dr. Moore on the characteristics of Dante is singularly interesting, and excellently handled. He is not inclined to believe implicitly in the well-known assertion of Boccaccio that Dante was a man of licentious life: if he was so, it is certainly odd that Francesco Villani should proclaim him to have been a "vite continentissimus." On this and on a score of other matters we would gladly dilate; but our readers' best course would be to peruse the book itself.

On points of detail we would very generally accept the ruling of Dr. Moore without further question; but two or three instances might be cited open to some doubt. For instance, the writer of the 'Compendio' attributed to Boccaccio says that Cardinal Bertrand de Poyet wanted to burn the bones of Dante, and he adds, "se giustamente o no, Iddio il sa" ("whether justly or no, God knows"). Dr. Moore thinks that Boccaccio could not have written a phrase of so cautious and neutral a kind. But it is not quite clear that the phrase really is neutral, for it is susceptible of the meaning, "God knows that this was unjust." On p. 66 the term "light works of Boccaccio" is applied to the 'Filocolo,' 'Filostrato,' and 'Fiammetta.' Unless "light" is to be construed as an epithet applicable to all works of fiction, we hardly think it rightly denotes any one of these works—surely not the 'Filocolo,' which is a monument of ponderosity and inflation in romance. Lionardo Aretino says that Dante describes in a letter the battle of Campaldino, in which he bore a part. He quotes from this or some other letter the words (as Englished by Dr. Moore) "where I found myself no mere child in the practice of arms, and where I was in great fear ["ebbi temenza molta"], and in the end rejoiced greatly, through the varying fortunes of that battle." Dr. Moore—though he would certainly be the last man to depreciate Dante in a serious spirit—suggests that the phrase "ebbi temenza molta" raises a doubt as to the poet's personal prowess in the battle. But it may well be questioned whether this phrase has any relation to an individual's courage and cowardice. The fact is (as our author points out) that the Guelphs, among whom, of course, was Dante, at first seemed to have lost the battle against the Ghibellines, and afterwards they gained it; and Dante's words probably mean no more than this, "I was first in great apprehension of a defeat, but finally I rejoiced in a victory." In a "supplementary note" about Beatrice, Dr. Moore remarks, as confirming the lady's real existence, that Boccaccio spoke of Beatrice Portinari, who married a Bardi, in his lectures before a Florentine audience, containing, no doubt, many persons who could have refuted him if he diverged from the truth. We do not think, however, that this consideration goes far towards proving that Dante, in writing about Beatrice, meant to refer to that Beatrice Portinari who had actually lived, and had actually married a Bardi. Even if the surviving connexions of the Portinari and Bardi families knew that Dante had not been in love with that very Beatrice, they would, perhaps, have been in no hurry to refute Boccaccio; for Dante was now a great national celebrity, and any association with him or his name had become a feather in the cap of all Bardis, still more of all Portinaris, and their respective connexions.

NOVELS OF THE WEEK.

- Cutting for Partners.* By J. Cordy Jeaffreson. 3 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)
The Old Hall among the Water Meadows. By Rosa Mackenzie Kettle. (Fisher Unwin.)
Gloriana; or, the Revolution of 1990. By Lady Florence Dixie. (Henry & Co.)
They have their Reward. By Blanche Atkinson. (George Allen.)
Two Women or One? By Henry Harland. (Cassell & Co.)
The Paradise of the North. By David Lawson Johnstone. (Remington & Co.)
Une Sous-Préfète. Par A. Gennevraye. (Paris, Calmann Lévy.)

MR. JEAFFRESON'S agreeable volumes form a pleasant contrast to the facile rubbish that is the staple of the fiction market. It is no hastily written scrap of sensation that the writer provides for us. It is almost too minute in detail, too conscientiously elaborate. Yet one feels no desire to omit any portion of it, though it is a book to read deliberately. It is a scholarly presentment of the age of our grandfathers and the succeeding generation, the truth of which appeals to all who remember the country some forty years ago. Admiral Challoner (Alacrity Challoner) fought as a boy under Nelson, and his elder brother won the coif when that legal embellishment was in its glory. The contrasted portraits of the brothers are good, but the serjeant soon retires from the scene, and the main interest centres in the admiral and the gentle and stately Antoinette his wife. The couple are touchingly described, both in the early days when the one coveted honour like a most offending soul, and the other pined secretly for the offspring of their lives, and later when, unconscious of each other's knowledge, they endeavoured piously to conceal their own fatal maladies. A novel turning upon heart-complaint seems a little morbid, but though in this and other matters Mr. Jeaffreson makes use of his medical information, there is nothing painful in his application of his favourite study. His doctors in their different ways are excellent, nor less so is his East Anglian lawyer, the family friend of the Fludgates, as the Challoners are latterly styled. His estimate of his native district and his contempt for "the shires" are amusing. At the same time, as to the East Anglian dialect he puts his case too high. It was true that "no man, woman, or child drops an h when the aspirate is needed or uses one when the h is out of place" when Mr. Norcross flourished, but railways and board schools are rapidly changing this, as well as other points distinctive of the people. On the sufficiency and probability of the plot tastes will differ. So truthful a person as Netta is hardly likely to have deceived her husband as to the parentage of Sophy, even for the benevolent purpose of endearing to him his brother's orphan grandchild. That having done so she should be miserable, and that her self-reproach is naturally and skilfully made prominent, will be admitted.

Miss Mackenzie Kettle has not lost her faculty of picturesque narration. The old hall among the water meadows, in its decayed and stately beauty and its calm surroundings, is charmingly contrasted with the wild sea-loughs and stormy gales, the barren bogs and grey hills of the west of Ireland. Nor are the characters without merit. The gallant soldier Hungerford (was it common for Protestants to join the Austrian army?), and the rather vague but picturesque O'Byrne, who rides about raising the mischief in county Mayo, and gets shot by his followers, more Hibernico, in mistake for the well-meaning Norman oppressor Randal Fitzmaurice, are good in their way. Mrs. Honor na Byrne is a sufficient Irish cailleach, with abundance of vituperative power, and a defective knowledge of political history. She leads the hapless Ada, who has a secret on her soul of which her remorseless follower avails herself, a terrible life. Of course this secret need not have separated people who love each other as do Fitzmaurice and his Saxon bride; but then this volume need not have been written. By dating her story shortly after the '98 Miss Kettle avoids touching too closely any existing sensibilities.

The evident earnestness of the author forbids her reader to regard 'Gloriana' as an elaborate joke. Yet, apart from the respect inspired by the writer's warm sympathy for the poor, and apparent honest conviction that the "monstrous regiment of women" is the only cure for social evils, it cannot be denied that (if certain gruesome details of the vicious side of life be excepted) most of the book is objectively amusing. Gloriana, or Gloria, de Lara, the illegitimate daughter of a woman of high birth and incomparable virtue, fired by her mother's wrongs, and determined to redress the balance of the time, induces her mother to send her to Eton, an ordeal far more severe than any undergone by the Chevalier D'Eon. However, she is triumphant in the boats and the playing fields, becomes head of the school, goes brilliantly through the university, and enters Parliament, yet is never discovered to be a beautiful woman. And in Parliament her speech did not, it seems, betray her. Apart from her voice, the matter of her harangues, consisting of continued assertion and no proof, is a little in pretty Fanny's way. She goes in for racing, wins the Derby, and eventually becomes Prime Minister of England. But it is unnecessary to trace in detail the course of "Hector D'Estrange." He or she is the centre of the book, and the numerous people of the first rank and fashion who revolve round him or her, all animated by the same sort of impulse which drives idle people to any fashionable excitement, bear much resemblance to each other. Still there are a good many characters, especially of the humbler sort, who have a touch of individuality. Of course, if one can swallow the improbabilities incident to Gloria's masquerade, it is easy to read the progress of the revolution, not without a sensation of how history repeats itself. Apparently without any authority from the Crown, a number of women's volunteer corps are formed under the gallant Lady Flora Desmond, née Ruglen (a thin disguise), who is at once a cavalry-man and, strangely enough, a Highlander. The climax of their triumph is when the Prime Minister Gloria, whose sex is thus discovered, has been found guilty of murdering a Satanic specimen of manhood, the villain of the piece. "Flora Desmond . . . rides rapidly . . . and enters what appears to be an immense riding-school, in which are drawn up a hundred troopers of the White Regiment. Her eye scans them keenly and rapidly. They are in perfect order and fit for any work. Every face is turned towards her. 'Hector D'Estrange has been declared guilty, and is condemned to die. I am here to lead you to his rescue.' Then these gallant ladies attack the prison van, in the style of the Fenians at Manchester, Lady Flora being quite sure her act is homicide, not murder, because she told the policeman to lie down before she fired through the door! It rather appears that the Guardswomen were themselves rescued from the Guardsmen, who, after many searchings of heart, were about to "go for them," by the intervention of a dense mob, which sacrificed itself till the ladies could escape. All this is admirable fooling, but does not advance the argument that our mothers and grandmothers were slaves or idiots, or that no difference in the sphere of usefulness should follow the distinction of sex. In a literary point of view this book is more carefully written, has fewer blunders, and is more interesting than any of our author's previous works.

'They have their Reward' would be lighter reading if that desirable consummation were reached a little earlier. Delightful as it is to meet with such unworldly people, the reader becomes a little weary of seeing half a million of money change hands so often. Snatched at the eleventh hour from the one person prepared to appreciate it, the despised fortune is finally settled upon a little girl, who is as yet happily too young to set the ball rolling still further. Miss Atkinson is to be congratulated upon having added a genuinely original touch of romance to the familiar miser of fiction. Mr. Booker, while refusing on his deathbed to recognize the claims of his grandchild, strays refreshingly from the orthodox path in proposing to leave his money to his old love, Mrs. North. Her son Bernard fails entirely in being as cynical and worldly as he would have us believe, but in the mean time it is surprising that one who congratulates himself upon his refined taste in women should be temporarily led astray by a palpably ill-bred young woman like Miss Pryde. Her story being strictly moral, Miss Atkinson concludes by reminding us that rewards are not always what the world takes them for, and this may account for the apparent neglect with which some of her most deserving characters are treated.

So rich was the store of striking and dramatic situations inherited from the East by the story-tellers and dramatists of Italy and Spain that there appears left for the modern weaver of romance nothing to invent. Like a barrel organ grinding over and over again the same sequence of tunes, human invention, as Dugald Stewart said, seems incapable of getting away from the old complications of the 'Arabian Nights' in the East, and from the adaptations of these by Boccaccio, Bandello, Cinthio, and other story-tellers in the West. To this generalization one remarkable exception has to be made. Plots founded on the sudden loss of memory resulting in absolute loss of identity, but without any other features of mania, scarcely exist, if at all, save in the imaginative literature of our own time. Stories of dual lives there are in plenty in the old story-tellers, and a peculiar fascination such stories have had. But always the duality has been accounted for either by the hero's self-conscious fraudulent personation of another or by some trick played upon him, as in the story of Abu-l-Hasan in the 'Thousand and One Nights,' in the story of the drunken Burgundian artisan in Heuterus ('Rerum Burgund.,' lib. iv.), and the story of Christopher Sly in the Induction to 'The Taming of the Shrew'; or by the mere passage of years from childhood to maturity, as in the story of Mignon; or by the sinister play of circumstance, as in Balzac's story of Col. Chabert. The paralysis of memory resulting from some deep mental disturbance or from some mechanical pressure upon the brain is, however, peculiarly suited for the motif of a story of dual existence in a time like our own, when matters of a purely scientific kind find literary treatment. Long before the appearance of 'Called Back' our contemporary story-tellers had discovered that here at last was something like new ore for imaginative treatment; but from lack of knowledge they handled it with becoming timidity till the appearance of 'Hard Cash,' a story in which one shock obliterated the identity of the character and another shock restored it. Since then it has been pretty considerably run upon, but almost always with a "plentiful lack" of originality until the appearance of the clever story of Mr. Harland. Assuming that the author would not thank us for divulging his plot, we can only say that nothing more startlingly new than the dénouement of 'Two Women or One?' could well be conceived, and that the situation is brought about by machinery which, striking as it is, would not be called impossible by any reader familiar with surgery and medical science. When we add that the tale is well written, and in parts is not without real literary excellence, we are doing all that the writer would wish us to do in the way of calling attention to his book.

In 'The Paradise of the North' the reader will find yet another story of a futile and uninteresting Utopia—this time at the North Pole itself. The British adventurers who discover it duly plant the Union Jack on the top. For it is a pole; and the author, by confession a Scotsman, pictures "a brither Scot" sitting on the summit. Mr. Johnstone's book is a budget of absurdities, which will entertain all who take it up in a receptive frame of mind. The inhabitants of the circumpolar kingdom do not always speak grammatical English, but they drink "inevitable ale," and spice it with Arctic herbs.

In 'Sous-Préfète,' by the author of 'Les Embarras d'un Capitaine de Dragons,' M. Gennevraye prints an amusing little story followed by a second tale, both of them what is called "thoroughly French." They give, however, a somewhat low idea of French life, and are decidedly not flattering, nor even fair, to either the people or the institutions of the country. We have often complained of misprints in French works, and this volume is not free from them; and we have also lately been appealed to with regard to the habit of French firms of selling books that are imperfect copies spoiled in the binding. We recently had a volume, published by M.

Calmann Lévy, sent us which was spoiled by the transposition of pages on a large scale. In the present case something even more startling has occurred, for a great number of pages of 'Honneur d'Artiste' have got into M. Gennevraye's second story, so that the reader goes suddenly from the prose of M. Gennevraye into that of M. Octave Feuillet.

RECENT VERSE.

Engelberg, and other Verses. By Beatrix L. Tollemache. (Percival & Co.)

A Song of Heroes. By John Stuart Blackie. (Blackwood & Sons.)

Wyndham Towers. By Thomas Bailey Aldrich. (Edinburgh, Douglas.)

The North Shore Watch, and other Poems. By George Edward Woodberry. (Boston, U.S., Houghton, Mifflin & Co.)

Day Lilies. By Jeanie Oliver Smith. (Putnam's Sons.)

Songs of the Sunland. By Alfred Chandler. (Adelaide, Wigg & Son; Melbourne, Muller.)

Thirty Short Poems. By Alexander Sutherland. (Melville, Mullen & Slade.)

An Atonement of East London, and other Poems. By Howard Crawford, M.A. (Blackwood & Sons.)

Rhymes Real and Romantic. By M. C. Tyndall. (Bristol, Arrowsmith; London, Simpkin & Co.)

MRS. LIONEL TOLLEMACHE'S 'Engelberg, and other Verses,' caused a feeling of disappointment. We had seemed to remember seeing at times, in the periodicals she mentions as having published some of the poems, contributions signed Beatrix Tollemache which gave an impression of higher poetic power than can be ascribed to her on the evidence of this volume. We still think that she possesses poetic ability; but its limitation is painfully obvious. What true poet could, for instance, feel and write of the sea as

So full of ever varying grace
That more and more appeals to me?

The piece in which this occurs and sundry others seem as if they had been produced because their author diligently resolved to spend a spare half-hour in writing verses, and thought such and such a subject would do—or as if, on the converse system, she had decided that such and such a subject was so poetic that she really ought to make a poem about it, just as amateurs in another line of art may be found deciding as to any and every imposing landscape they chance upon that, since it is a fine one, they ought to make a water-colour drawing of it. But when Mrs. Tollemache has a subject which has really possessed her mind she does good work. The thought is not particularly deep, but it is thought; the feeling is not greatly marked by intensity or by pathos, but it is feeling; and she versifies this thought and feeling in good clear poetic diction, and often with happy similes and turns. One of the best of her poems—we are inclined to call it the best—exemplifies these good qualities, and we notice for special praise the simile in the third verse, which, if perhaps not botanically exact, is faithful as an illustration and is a beautiful one:—

SHALL LOVE BE CHANGEFUL?

Shall love be changeful as the waning moon?
Shall shadows darken this—life's highest boon?

Change, if there be, should yet be only growth,
Love waxing stronger, fuller, than in days—
Those youthful days—of early plighted troth,
So rich in burning words of love and praise.

Deeper the love now lies, as carved names
Lie in the heart of oak where none may see,
Until the woodman's axe the timber claims,
And cleaving strokes the woodland secret free.

A living love, that from its first green shoot,
When summer comes sends forth the fragrant flowers,
And for dark days, when joyous tones are mute,
Still stores up autumn wealth in sheltering bowers.

No shallow stream, whose life the sun may kill;
No torrent with a stony bed laid bare;
But a deep ocean from whose waves distil
Soft clouds that shield us from the summer's glare.

The verses prefixed to the first poem in Prof. Blackie's volume 'A Song of Heroes,' as an introduction to the series, both describe his intention and show his literary method in carrying it out:—

I will sing a song of heroes
Crowned with manhood's diadem,
Men that lift us, when we love them,
Into nobler life with them.
I will sing a song of heroes
To their God-sent mission true,
From the ruin of the old times
Grandly forth to shape the new;
Men that, like a strong-winged zephyr,
Come with freshness and with power,
Bracing fearful hearts to grapple
With the problem of the hour;
Men whose prophet-voice of warning
Stirs the dull, and spurs the slow,
Till the big heart of a people
Swells with hopeful overflow.

He uses the same versification in each of the poems, and to most ears it will sound too jaunty not to be a little aggravating when used so long. It is like having a dance tune, cheery and pleasant enough for a short time, played over and over again interminably. The heroes Prof. Blackie has chosen are Abraham, Moses, David, Socrates, Alexander, Cæsar (Caius Julius), and St. Paul for "the old world"; Columba, Alfred, Wallace and Bruce, for the Middle Ages; Luther, Cromwell, Washington, Nelson and Wellington, for "the new world." Amid this varied list Prof. Blackie's enthusiasm never fails him, and if the measure is somewhat jingling yet there is plenty of spirit. Only the best way to recognize it is not to read on steadily, but to alight on passages here and there. In this way the reader may refresh himself with verses like this one:—

Luther came: it might rain devils;
Devils bring no fear to him;
In the drowning of a world,
He who trusts in God will swim.

Mr. Aldrich's tale in blank verse dwells on the somewhat worn theme of the love of two brothers for the same girl and the wicked jealousy of the worse of the two. Of course the preferred and preferable suitor meets his death at the hands of the other, but, as the murderer gets accidentally imprisoned in a secret closet to which he had conveyed the corpse of his victim, the crime remains undiscovered and the disappearance of the brothers is left a puzzle to the neighbourhood, although Queen Elizabeth insists on Lord Burleigh's discovering the missing men. In the year of Charles II.'s death the ancient house, Wyndham Towers, which had been neglected and consequently had fallen under suspicion of being haunted, was being done up, and a workman, "one Gregory Nokes, a very honest soul," discovered the closet and in it "two grim shapes"

in guise fantastical
Of hose and doublet: one stretched out full length
Supine, and one in terror-stricken sort
Half toppled forward on the bended knee,
Grasping with vice-like grip the other's wrist,
As who should say, Arouse thee, sleep no more!
But said it not. If they were quick or dead,
No sign they gave beyond this sad dumb show.

The face of the murderer, "drawn and wrenched by mortal throes," still wore the "beseeching look" of his long hopeless agony. But before any one could come at Nokes's call, the figures suddenly crumbled,

And nought was left of that most piteous pair
Save two long rapiers of some foreign make Lying there crossed, a mass of flaky rust.

Mr. Aldrich does not explain how the details of the murderer's overhearing undiscovered the love secret of his brother and the girl, the brothers' meeting, the murder, the concealment of the body, and all the murderer's emotions before and after the deed came on record. The girl, who, we gather, pined quickly to death, never knew anything about what had happened, and seems not even to have revealed that the brothers had wooed her; no one else knew even as much as she. Are we to suppose that Gregory Nokes was miraculously inspired with minute information on what no human being but the murderer had ever known? The story might have been worked out in a sensational novel or melodrama. In 'Wyndham Towers' it has not proved a good subject for a poem. And we doubt whether gruesome subjects are the most fitted for Mr. Aldrich's muse. He seems at his best, though a little strained, in descriptions of nature. His blank verse, on the Tennysonian model mainly, is very fair.

Mr. Woodberry's volume, 'The North Shore Watch, and other Poems,' is difficult reading. But that can scarcely be because it was easy writing, for it is exceedingly laboured. The sentences are so long, so recondite, so cleverly superior, that we get bewildered, like captives in a clueless labyrinth; and the metres are of abnormal elaborateness and exactingness when regular, and studiously crabbed where, as in the long rhapsody 'My Country' (the United States), Mr. Woodberry takes some comparative ease in the licence of the ode. The ease he grants himself and his readers is, however, cruelly small, and 'My Country' has an odd effect, as if he has been striving to translate imitatively a Greek chorus bristling with doubtful passages, and it had proved too hard for him. It is this sort of thing:—

Oh, whisper to thy clustered isles,
If any rosy promise round them smiles;
Oh, call to every seaward promontory,
If one of them, perchance, is made the cape of glory;
Oh, bid the mountains answer thy inquire,
If any peak be tipped with lonely fire,
A shining name
And station of the winged flame
Above the time's desire!

The title poem is the best in the book, because, being partly a threnody, it here and there has some lines about a dead boy of which the purport can be caught. 'Agathon,' a kind of allegorical mystery with Grecian dramatis personæ, needs far more study for its comprehension than it tempts us to bestow; though during the effort of perusal we were aware of some good passages. The fact seems to be that Mr. Woodberry has much mental ability much cultivated, and that, though he has not a musical ear and only goes right in metre because he knows prosody, he has quite sufficient talent for poetry to enable him to write what could be read with gratification if he would be less ambitiously scholarly and would write his Greek exercises in Greek and his English verse like other folk. More than this we cannot well discern under his cumbrous artificiality; but we are not quite sure that he is not a poet in disguise.

It is hard to understand why Jeanie Oliver Smith, author of the book of verse called 'Day Lilies,' should spend her literary efforts on verse instead of prose. The absence of poetic feeling in her work is remarkable, and she is without even the instinct which guides writers of cultivated taste to avoid prosaic penny-a-line long words in their verse and to select natural and simple phraseology. The metre is correct, though without melody.

Mr. Chandler, the South Australian poet, known by his 'Bush Idyll,' has published a new volume. The first and longest poem, called 'Love or Fame,' might have been entitled 'Apollo in Australia.' Though pretty, it is not, however, specially Australian in form, and reminds us of the 'Endymion' of Keats. It is better than the Australian patriotic poems which end the book.

In 'Short Poems,' by Mr. Sutherland, a well-known historian and journalist of Melbourne, the little poem called 'Hetty' strikes us as being a remarkably successful example of simple verse.

Mr. Howard Crawford, author of 'An Atonement of East London, and other Poems,' has poetic ability, and, we think, poetic strength, but at present his efforts are so strained and exaggerated that it is not easy to recognize what real power he may possess. As to the kind of his gift in song, he himself has still that to learn, for it is not in human nature to be both Alexander Smith and Robert Browning, and, with exceptions too few and slight to be worth counting, all the poems in this volume which do not appear to have been written by the ghost of Alexander Smith are undisguised exercises in the art of resembling Robert Browning. We hope that when Mr. Crawford publishes more verse, as he doubtless will, he will enable his critics to discern his individuality, and also that he will have learnt that in verse as in prose hyperbole and inflated metaphor will not make commonplace matters poetic, though sometimes simplicity may.

M. C. Tyndall has published a volume of 'Rhymes Real and Romantic' in seven books. Fortunately this is by no means so ponderous a bulk of literature as it sounds, for the pieces are all short and the number of them to a book is but a fraction over eight. The distinction the title indicates between the real and the romantic poems appears to be that the ballads on historical subjects, of which there are several, are the "real," and the "romantic" are the stanzas in various metres (including ballad metre) on historical and mythological themes subjectively presented, and on more general poetic motives, such as 'Silence,' 'Sunrise,' 'Sunset,' 'In the Far-Off Land,' 'From my Window,' &c. There is nothing jarring in M. C. Tyndall's versification. We are sorry we can give no higher and no other praise.

LOCAL ANTIQUARIAN LITERATURE.

The Materials for the History of the Town of Wellington. By A. L. Humphreys. (Henry Gray.)—We had occasion recently, in reviewing a 'History of Basingstoke,' to suggest that 'Materials for a History' would have been a more accurate designation. Mr. Humphreys, whose work is of the same character, has modestly adopted the preferable style. It is unfortunate for the author that his materials are so meagre, and the history of Wellington, it would seem, so uneventful. Those who would recover some traces of its original village community, who would watch its struggles and observe its development, will be doomed to disappointment; for the early history of the town is virtually a blank. What we learn from Mr. Humphreys is just enough to make us wish for more. Wellington, with Buckland, was part of the endowment of the see of Wells from its foundation to the days of Edward VI., when it passed into the grasping hands of the Duke of Somerset. The old manorial courts, Baron and Leet, continued in existence till superseded by the Local Board in 1873, but the only records of them extant are the presentments since 1815, with a few stray entries of the days of Charles II. The chief officers of the community were the Portreeve, Aleaster, Bailiff, &c., annually elected, but their names have only been preserved since 1815. The first office, however, was doubtless of immemorial antiquity. The author is mistaken in supposing that King John's grant to the church of Wells of immunity from toll for their tenants had anything to do with the local government or the election of a Portreeve. A chance mention of a "Fraternitas," with the reference to a "Brotherhood Priest," suggests the existence of a religious guild, but we hear no more of it. So, too, we read of a "chantry," but where, or by whom founded, we are not told. The earliest registers of the parish begin in 1683, and the churchwardens' accounts rather later, so that Mr. Humphreys has not been fortunate in this respect. He has, however, made the best of his scanty materials, and has added some valuable subsidy rolls, lists of modern field and farm names, an excellent catalogue of the vicars, and (O si sic omnes!) full copies of all inscriptions in the parish church. The woollen manufacture, the great local industry, is duly noticed, but it must frankly be confessed that Mr. Humphreys's work is almost exclusively of local interest. Wellingtonians will find in his pages much miscellaneous information on families formerly resident in their town, and on its trade and growth in modern times. In one matter the author has set an excellent example: he has sought out the references to Wellington in the narratives of bygone English tourists, such as see the light from time to time. If this example were more widely followed by local historians, they might often enliven their pages by bright contemporary sketches of a town as it appeared in the past. We must not forget to praise the rather unusual addition of a painstaking local bibliography, and the by no means too usual boon of a copious index.

The Parish Register of Marsham, Norfolk, from 1538 to 1836. Edited by A. T. Michell, M.A. (Norwich, Jarrolds.)—This makes the third Norfolk register which has been published, its predecessors being the very fine register of North Elmham by Legge, and the very small one of Bircham Newton by Howlett and Rye. St. George, Tombland, Norwich, is, we believe, in the press, Mr. Jay having undertaken it, and an unusually large number of other registers are being transcribed, so it is to be hoped that substantial progress will be made. Mr. Michell himself, we believe, contemplates printing the register of Stratton Strawless. He has done his work very carefully and well, and has noted everything worthy of note, even to the change of handwriting in the registers. The volumes printed here have had a more than usually eventful history, for in 1835, when the church was broken into, the thieves, disappointed in plunder, tore most of them up and scattered the fragments about the churchyard and adjoining fields. They were all recovered and pieced together, except a fragment of the earliest register and the volume for 1653-84. Some of the latter has been recovered from the register bills, and incidentally Mr. Michell brings glad tidings to Norfolk antiquaries, for from what he says it is clear that Dr. Bensly and Mr. Overbury have recently reduced them into order from what was formerly chaos. Mr. Michell has wisely prefaced a short account of his parish, its church, its monuments, and its rectors. It is a pity he did not add the inscriptions from the churchyard; but we must not look so good a gift-horse in the mouth. With his censure on the impropriety of a recent curate removing a fragment of stained glass, bearing an inscription to a presumed ancestor, for insertion in a private house all antiquaries must cordially agree.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

MR. P. FITZGERALD chose a good subject when he selected King Theodore of Corsica as the subject of the first of a new series of books published by Messrs. Vizetelly; but he has scarcely done justice to his story in the telling of it. The little volume might have been made much more interesting.

A LARGE number of new editions are on our table: among them the fourth issue of the famous Sabrina Corolla (Bell), the first that has appeared since death removed Dr. Kennedy from our midst, and seen through the press by Dr. Holden and Mr. Archer Hind.—Messrs. Rivington have reissued, in one convenient volume, the excellent memoir of Christopher Wordsworth, Bishop of Lincoln, by Canon Overton and Miss Wordsworth.—Messrs. Reeves & Turner have sent us a third and revised issue of Mr. Forman's excellent edition, in one volume, of The Poetical Works of John Keats; and a second edition of the Letters of John Keats to Fanny Brawne, also due to Mr. Forman. The same publishers have reissued three of the early volumes of "The Library of Old Authors," Selden's Table Talk, Drummond's Poetical Works, and the Remarkable Providences of Increase Mather, all of them reprints that will be welcome to many.—Messrs. Methuen have brought out a third edition of Miss F. M. Robinson's clever novel, The Plan of Campaign.—Messrs. Macmillan have published a second edition of Sir John Lubbock's pleasant Scientific Lectures; a tasteful reprint, in one volume each, of Kingsley's Glaucus (one of the pleasantest of his writings), of With the Immortals of Mr. Marion Crawford, and Agatha's Husband, by Mrs. Craik.—We have received from Mr. G. Allen a reprint of Mr. Ruskin's famous Seven Lamps of Architecture. We wish Mr. Five per Cent. would study Aphorism 31, on p. 353. Mr. Allen has also sent us reissues of Aratra Pentelici and Val d'Arno.—A volume of graceful verse by Mr. E. Mackay, partly reprinted, partly consisting of new pieces, has been added to "The Lotos Series" of Messrs. Trübner.—Messrs. Chatto & Windus have issued a new edition of a deservedly popular volume, the selection of Essays by Leigh Hunt, taken from the Indicator, and edited, with an introduction and notes, by the late Mr. Ollier.—Messrs. Griffith & Farran have made some welcome additions to their popular and really excellent "Library of Theological Literature," such as a second volume of Massillon's Sermons, Bishop Kaye's work on Clement of Alexandria, the late Mr. Poole's Life of St. Cyprian, and The Prayer-Book of Queen Elizabeth.—Messrs. Sonnenschein have brought out in one convenient volume Mr. Middleton's excellent translation of Burckhardt's Civilization of the Renaissance in Italy.

We have to welcome the appearance in the field of literature of Mlle. Jeanne Samary, known as an actress at the Théâtre Français, and as the first laugh in the world. Peals such as she sets up on the smallest provocation will not be elicited from children by her nursery book, Les Gourdmandises de Charlotte (Hachette & Co.), to which no less a person than M. Pailleron contributes a preface.

We have on our table Life of George Eliot, by Oscar Browning (W. Scott),—Spain of To-day, by W. R. Lawson (Blackwood),—A New Review of National Education, by H. Bigg (Stott),—Sentences for Translation into French, by E. E. Bowen (Percival & Co.),—The Modern Language Examiner for Paper or V. V. Work, by E. A. Rowe (Relfe Brothers),—The First Three Books of Homer's Iliad, with Commentary and Vocabulary for the Use of Schools by T. D. Seymour (Arnold),—Exercises in Practical Chemistry, by Dr. W. R. Hodgkinson (Kenning),—Influenza and Common Colds, by W. T. Fernie, M.D. (Percival & Co.),—Report of the Meteorological Service of the Dominion of Canada, 1886, by O. Carpmel (Ottawa, Chamberlin),—The Antiquary, Vol. XX. (Stock),—The Old Corner Shop, by A. T. Story (Authors' Co-operative Publishing Co.),—A Society Scandal, by Rita (Trischler & Co.),—English Babes and Irish Bullies, by Storicus (Kennett, Towersey & Co.),—Elegies and Memorials, by A. and L. (Kegan Paul),—Essays in Verse, by D. G. Harris (H. Cox),—The Unknown God, by C. L. Brace (Hodder & Stoughton),—A Manual for Catechizing, with Stories and Illustrations, by the Rev. W. F. Shaw (Griffith & Farran),—Sibyllinische Blätter, by H. Diels (Williams & Norgate),—Heinrich von Eichenfels, by Chr. von Schmid, with Notes and Vocabulary by G. E. Fasnacht (Macmillan),—Le Journal de la Jeunesse, Vol. I., 1889 (Hachette),—Das Leben Mirabeaus, by A. Stern, 2 vols. (Nutt),—Die jüngste Kritik des Galaterbriefes auf ihre Berechtigung geprüft, by J. Gloel (Leipzig, Deichert),—Jeanne d'Arc, by A. de Lamartine, edited, with Notes and a Vocabulary, by A. Barrère (Boston, U.S., Heath & Co.),—and Manzoni's Les Fiancés (Hachette). Among New Editions we have How to Appeal against your Rates in the Metropolis, by A. D. Lawrie (Wilson & Co.),—The Local Examination History, from before the Roman Invasion to the Present Time, by R. S. Pringle, LL.D. (J. Heywood),—The English Language (Moffatt & Paige),—The New Arithmetic, edited by S. Eaton (Boston, U.S., Heath & Co.),—Handbook of Railway Stations, &c., by H. Oliver and J. Airey (McCorquodale & Co.),—An Elementary Treatise on Light and Heat, by the Rev. F. W. Aveling (Relfe Brothers),—Kingston's The Three Midshipmen (Griffith & Farran),—Björnson's Arne and the Fisher Lassie, translated from the Norse, with an Introduction, by W. Low (Bell),—Keats, by S. Colvin (Macmillan),—and Health Troubles of City Life, by G. Herschell, M.D. (Sonnenschein).

LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

ENGLISH.

Theology.

Abbot's (F. E.) The Way out of Agnosticism, or the Philosophy of Free Religion, cr. 8vo. 4/6 cl.
Andrews's (W.) Curiosities of the Church, 8vo. 6/ cl.
Elmille's (Prof. W. G.) Memoir and Sermons, edited by W. R. Nicoll and A. N. Macnicoll, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
Gibson's (J. M.) Gospel of St. Matthew, cr. 8vo. 7/6 cl. (Expositor's Bible).
Kingsley's (C.) Village Sermons and Town and Country Sermons, cheap edition, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Liddon's (Rev. H. P.) Practical Reflections on Every Verse of the Psalter or Psalms of David, cr. 8vo. 5/ cl.
Matheson's (Rev. A. S.) The Gospel and Modern Substitutes, cr. 8vo. 5/ cl.
Young's (R.) Success of Christian Missions, cr. 8vo. 5/ cl.

Law.

Short (F. H.) and Mellor's (F. H.) Practice on the Crown Side of the Queen's Bench Division, 8vo. 30/ cl.

Poetry.

Haggard's (E.) Life and its Author, an Essay in Verse, 3/6 cl.

History and Biography.

Eales's (S. J.) St. Bernard, Abbot of Clairvaux, A.D. 1090-1155, 12mo. 2/6 cl.
Little's (Rev. H. W.) Henry M. Stanley, his Life, Travels, and Explorations, 8vo. 10/6 cl.
Mahan's (Capt. A. T.) Influence of Sea Power upon History, 8vo. 18/ cl.
Memoirs of Ernest II., Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, Vols. 3 and 4, trans. from German by P. Andrae, 8vo. 25/ cl.
Powell (F. Y.), Mackay (J. M.), and Tout's (T. F.) History of England: Part 3, William and Mary to Present Time, 12mo. 2/6 cl.
Thomas, tenth Earl of Dundonald, Autobiography of a Seaman, edited by his Grandson, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
Visitations of English Cluniac Foundations, translated by Sir G. F. Duckett, 8vo. 7/6 cl.
Woodbury's (C. J.) Talks with Ralph Waldo Emerson, 5/ cl.

Geography and Travel.

Handy Guide-Book to the Japanese Islands, with Maps and Plans, cr. 8vo. 6/6 cl.

Philology.

Shuckburgh's (E. B.) Herodotus: Book 5, Terpsichore, with Introduction, Notes, and Map, 12mo. 3/ cl.
Wharton's (E. R.) Etyma Latina, an Etymological Lexicon of Classical Latin, cr. 8vo. 7/6 cl.

Science.

Ebner's (W.) A Laboratory Course of Pharmacy and Materia Medica, cr. 8vo. 8/6 cl.
Gould's (G. M.) A New Medical Dictionary, 8vo. 16/ cl.
Halsey's (F. A.) Slide Valve Gears, cr. 8vo. 8/6 cl.
Marcy's (H. O.) The Perineum, its Anatomy, Physiology, &c., 8vo. 5/ cl.
Poulton's (E. B.) The Colours of Animals, their Meaning and Use, cr. 8vo. 5/ cl.
Pringle's (A.) Practical Photo-Micrography, 8vo. 10/6 cl.
Rideal's (S.) Practical Chemistry for Medical Students, 2/ cl.
Roth's (H. L.) Guide to the Literature of Sugar, 8vo. 7/6 cl.
Steel's (R. E.) Natural Science Examination Papers: Part 2, Physics, edited by A. M. M. Stedman, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Williams (J. W. H.) On Unsoundness of Mind in its Legal and Medical Considerations, 8vo. 7/6 cl.
Wynter (W. E.) and Wethered's (F.) Manual of Clinical and Practical Pathology, 8vo. 12/6 cl.

General Literature.

Bacon's (F.) Essays, or Counsels, Civil and Moral, 3/ cl.
Balch's (W. R.) The Busy Man's Handbook, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Blackmore's (R. D.) Springhaven, illus., cheaper edition, 6/ cl.
Braddon's (Miss) The Day Will Come, 12mo. 2/ bds.
Brinton's (D. G.) Essays of an Americanist, 8vo. 12/ cl.
Corelli's (M.) Ardathe, the Story of a Dead Self, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
Corelli's (Mrs.) The Head of the Family, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Cushing's (W.) Anonyms, a Dictionary of Revealed Authorship, 2 vols. royal 8vo. 52/6 half bound.
Goulo's (S. Baring) Jacquetta, and other Stories, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Harris's (E. M.) Lady Dobbs, 2 vols. 12mo. 21/ cl.
Hayes's (P. S.) Electricity, and the Methods of its Employment in removing Superfluous Hair, 12mo. 6/ cl.
Heathcote's (J. M.) Tennis: Bouvier's (E. O. P.) Rackets; Ainger's (A. C.) Fives, 10/6 cl. (Badminton Library).
Hints and Points for Sportsmen, compiled by Seneca, 6/ cl.
Life's Remorse (A.) by Author of 'Molly Bawn', cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
MacKnight's (A.) Only a Fisher Maiden, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Milne-Horne's (M. P.) Mamma's Black Nurse Stories, 5/ cl.
Rathbone's (W.) History and Progress of District Nursing, 12mo. 2/6 cl.
Sergeant's (J.) Little Miss Colwyn, 3 vols. 31/6 cl.
Service's (J.) Thir Notandums, being the Literary Recollections of Laird Canticlar, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Silken Threads, a Detective Story, by Author of 'Mr. and Mrs. Morton', cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Stroud's (F.) The Judicial Dictionary of Words and Phrases Judicially Interpreted, roy. 8vo. 30/ cl.
Thornton's (L.) Opposites, a Series of Essays on the Unpopular Sides of Popular Questions, 8vo. 12/6 cl.
Wood's (Mrs. H.) The Master of Greylands, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.

FOREIGN.

Theology.

Hase (Karl v.): Gesammelte Werke, Vol. 1, Part 1, 5m.
Fine Art and Archaeology.
Antike Denkmäler, hrsg. vom Kaiserl. Deutschen Archäolog. Institut, Vol. 1, Part 4, 40m.

- Music.*
Pagnette (L.): Charles Gounod, 5fr.
- History and Biography.*
Karpeles (G.): Allgemeine Geschichte der Litteratur, Vol. 1, 2m.
Mémoires et Correspondance du Comte de Villèle, Vol. 5, 1fr. 50.
Petrescu (G.), Sturdza (D.), et Sturdza (D. C.): Actes et Documents relatifs à l'Histoire de la Roumanie, Vols. 2 to 5, 60fr.
- Philology.*
Helten (W. L. van): Altostfriesische Grammatik, 8m. 50.
Otten (G.): The Language of the Rushworth Gloss, 1m.
Osthoff (H.) und Brugmann (K.): Morphologische Untersuchungen auf dem Gebiete der Indogermanischen Sprachen, Part 5, 7m.
- General Literature.*
Banville (T. de): L'Amie de Paris, 3fr. 50.
Calmettes (F.): Sœur Aînée, 2fr. 50.
Guillou (A.): Pendant la Terreur, 3fr. 50.
Lotti (P.): Le Roman d'un Enfant, 3fr. 50.
Sales (P.): Le Sergent Renaud, 3fr. 50.

CROSSING THE BAR.

Ἀλλος δέδωκε, λέλαμπεν ἄσπ' ἔσπερος, λαμπρὰ μὲ καλεῖ τις ὄμφα· μὴδ' ἄλλος βαρύστονος ἦχος εἶν ἐντ' ἂν ἀπέλθω, ῥέυμα δ' οἶον ἦκα καθύδον ἔρποι νόσφιν ἀφλοισμοῦ κελάδου τε πλῆθον, ἂδ' ἀπορροῶ βαθέων ἀπείρων ὄκκ' ἀνακάμψῃ οἴκαδ' αὖτις. "Ἀμφιλύκα κνεφαῖον νῆξ φέρεϊ κώδωνα, τὰ δ' ἐνθεν ὄρβνα· μὴδ' πενήθης τις ὀδυρμὸς εἶν ναυστολέοντος,
τῆλε μὲν χρόνον τε τόπον τ' ἄπουρον τῆλε πλῆμυρόν πελάγος μ' ἀπάξει, ἐλπομαι δ' εἰς ὅπα πέραν κυβερνα-τῆρος ἀθρήσειν.

E. L. L.

AMERICAN COPYRIGHT.

2, Dean's Yard, Westminster, May 13, 1890.

AN American, in these days following the defeat of the Copyright Bill, must approach any question touching the relations of English authors to America with a decent reluctance; but these days, humiliating as they are to Americans, are perhaps not the best season for recrimination, either. May I speak for Mr. Lovell, therefore, in reply to Mr. Joseph Hatton's singular statement in the last issue of the Athenæum, to the effect that his story 'By Order of the Czar' was issued in Mr. Lovell's "International Series" without his authority or permission? Mr. Hatton has evidently forgotten the important circumstance that he several years since yielded to Messrs. Tillotson, of Bolton—presumably for a consideration—the right to sell for America the authorization which he complains has not been obtained from him. Mr. Lovell, as Mr. Hatton would have found if he had taken the pains to address Messrs. Tillotson before communicating with you, purchased from Messrs. Tillotson so long ago as 1888, for a substantial sum, the sole right to publish 'By Order of the Czar' in the United States, as from the author. The obstacle encountered by Mr. Hatton's English publishers in selling this right in America is merely that properly encountered in the attempt to sell the same commodity twice. The unhappy difficulties which beset all dealings with America on the part of English writers are not cleared or bettered, one would say, by the habit of loose statement regarding the doings of American publishers, whose "game"—Mr. Hatton is persuaded to elegance by his theme—is by no means always one of "bluff."

WOLCOTT BALESTIER.

THE STORY OF A SONNET.

The Homestead, Lathom, Ormskirk.

AMONGST the "Miscellaneous Sonnets" in the 1832 edition of 'Wordsworth's Poetical Works,' No. XLV. is entitled 'Filial Piety'; and in Prof. Knight's edition of Wordsworth, 1882, and others, this sonnet has the sub-title 'On the Wayside between Preston and Liverpool,' which serves to localize its narrative.

Some years since, during a systematic reading of Wordsworth's poems in our family circle, my wife remarked at the close of the reading of this sonnet that she was sure it referred to the consecration of a curious memorial by her great-grandfather, and, though at that time no rumour of its celebration in verse had reached the family, there can be little doubt that Wordsworth intended to commemorate this singular development of reverence.

The tradition handed down in the family is this. One Thomas Scarisbrick was killed by a flash of lightning whilst building his turf-stack in 1779. His son James Scarisbrick, who was then thirty years old, completed the stack, and ever after during his life reverently kept it in repair as a memorial of his father. James died in 1824, consequently for forty-five years he had tended this rude monument, and to further perpetuate the remembrance of it he left to his grandchildren sets of goblets and decanters, on each of which are incised his own and his wife's monogram and a representation of the turf-stack between two trees.

The large farm is still occupied by the descendants of this Scarisbrick, though it now has a modern house. That which existed in Wordsworth's time was on the same site, about a mile north of Ormskirk, and abutted to the Preston highway. It comprised a straggling low cottage, thatched and limewashed, with a brick addition of two stories at its north end, adjoining which, green with age and memories, the turf-stack stood between two large sycamore trees, one of which yet flourishes.

I have before me as I write a set of the goblets, but the stack was pulled down and its turf used for field drainage on the farm within six years after the death of James Scarisbrick in 1824; and as Wordsworth passed the farm in that year, just before Scarisbrick's death, and again in 1828, when on his way to Liverpool, I should be inclined to adopt either of these dates, with a preference for 1824, as the epoch of the composition of the sonnet, rather than 1832, which has been assigned to it.

Prof. Knight, to whom I have submitted some of these facts, thinks they prove that the composition is wrongly dated, and my object in writing to the Athenæum is to place on record the true story of this sonnet and its correlative dates for the benefit of future editors of Wordsworth.

I will not trespass on your space with a reprint of the sonnet, which pretty closely follows the family story. Your readers will find it and its variant of 1837, with an interesting note, in Prof. Knight's 'The Poetical Works of William Wordsworth,' vol. vii. pp. 311-12.

JAMES BROMLEY.

THE ANONYMOUS 'BOECE DE CONSOLATION,' BRUGES, 1477, AND PARIS, 1494.

Marlborough College, May 7, 1890.

DR. MORRIS, on p. xiii of his introduction to Chaucer's 'Boece' (Early English Text Society, Extra Series, V., 1869 and 1889), remarks, "Chaucer did not English Boethius second-hand through any early French version," and goes on to support this statement by a number of parallel passages taken, as he affirms, from Jean de Meun's translation of the 'De Consolatione Philosophiæ.' Internal evidence and Ten Brink's words on the subject ('Chaucer-Studien,' p. 139) are sufficient, I think, to remove all doubt that Chaucer translated straight from a Latin original. But while admitting the fact I beg leave to question the validity of Dr. Morris's proof of it. What authority has he for fathering the quotations which he uses to compare with Chaucer on Jean de Meun? It is true that the B.M. Catalogue does ascribe to this writer the translation printed for Antoine Vêrad in 1494, from which Dr. Morris is evidently quoting (see note 5 on p. ii of his introduction); but this is surely a grave mistake. Jean de Meun died in 1305, while the "honneste clerc désolé querant sa consolation en la translation de cestui livre," which is a word-for-word reprint of Colard Mansion's 1477 edition, gives this last year and the Eve of St. Peter and St. Paul's Day for the completion of his task. It is all to be found in the translator's epilogue, and I cannot imagine what reasons the Museum authorities and Dr. Morris have for depriving the nameless scholar, whoever he was (Brunet suggests possibly Colard Mansion himself, 'La Fr. Litt. au XV^e Siècle,' p. 29), of the honour of a most respectable piece of work.

It may well be that this blunder was found out long ago, and that I am only flogging a dead horse; but if this is so, why does the B.M. Catalogue remain uncorrected, and why is there no note of explanation in Dr. Morris's book, reprinted only last year? HUGH STEWART.

SALES.

Two important sales of rare and valuable works took place at the rooms of Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge on the 2nd and 5th of May. In the former the chief articles were: Boccaccio, Decamerone, traduit par Le Maçon, 21l. 10s. Laborde, Choix de Chansons, 78l. Marguerite de Valois, Contes, first edition with cuts by Romeyn de Hooge, 13l. 10s. Ovide, Metamorphoses, par Banier, 22l. and 16l. Æsopi Fabulæ, Aldine edition, 22l. Buck's Views, 71l. Delange et Borneman, Œuvre de Palissy et Faïences Italiennes, 27l. 15s. Galerie de Florence, 25l. 10s. Holbein's Court of Henry VIII., 71l. Petrarca, 1472 edition, 55l. Suetonius, printed in 1471 by Jensen, 31l. Rosini, Storia della Pittura Italiana, 19l. 10s. Thucydides, printed by Aldus, 27l. The 192 lots sold for 1,192l. 6s.

In the sale of May 5th the following works excited most interest: First edition of Jane Austen's Pride and Prejudice, 5l. 10s. Burns's Poems, first edition, 107l. Cowper's Poems and Task, first editions, 12l. 15s. Dickens's Pickwick, 23l. Duten's Origine des Découvertes, 20l. 10s. Emerson's Nature, first edition, 9l. Dr. Faustus, Life and Death, 8l. 12s. 6d. Fielding's Tom Jones, Joseph Andrews, and Amelia, all first editions, 26l. 5s. Fouilloux, Vénérerie, 21l. 15s. Ben Jonson's Works, first edition, 27l. La Fontaine's Fables, first edition, 45l. 10s. Lamb's Poems, first edition, 7l. Locke on the Human Understanding, first edition, 8l. 15s. The Original Marriage Contract of Mary, Queen of Scots, 45l. 10s. Milton's Paradise Lost and Regained, first editions, 19l. 5s. Molière, Le Sicilien, first edition, 16l. Ovide, Metamorphoses, par Banier, 18l. Romance of Prince Arthur, 19l. 10s. Ruskin's Architecture of Venice, 33l. Sarum Missal, 1509 edition, 70l. Shakespeare's Plays, Fourth Folio, 45l.; Merry Devil of Edmonton, attributed to Shakespeare, 41l. Rich's Faults, 31l. Wynkyn de Worde's Book of Justices of Pees, 46l.; and his Carta Feodi, 25l. The 292 lots produced 1,607l. 16s.

DR. FORCHHAMMER.

EMMANUEL FORCHHAMMER, the intelligence of whose sudden death was received in London by telegram from Rangoon early this month, was a native of Coire, in Switzerland. There is no record of the early course of his education, but we may fairly assume that his tastes for linguistic studies were paramount even at school; for instead of following the usual road of enrolling himself as a student at one of the universities he proceeded at once to Mexico and Central America, where he spent a number of years of assiduous study and research in the libraries of the old monasteries, to collect what information he could about the remains of a long-forgotten aboriginal literature. The result of his labours consisted of a dozen folio volumes of texts and notes. He did not, however, at once work at these extensive materials on his return to Europe in 1874, but considered it wiser to stay first for some time at a German university, with a view to acquiring both a wider range of linguistic knowledge and a proper training in the scientific methods of treating philological questions. He chose Leipzig, where the lectures of Brockhaus, Fleischer, and Von der Gabelentz were offering all the advantages that he was in search of, and he made the best of his opportunities for fully four years to lay in a rich store of information and methodical training. The languages which he cultivated with special devotion were Sanskrit, Pali, Tibetan, Armenian, Chinese, and Arabic.

When, in the early part of 1878, the Professorship of Pali in the Government High School, Rangoon, became vacant Forchhammer was recommended for that post not only as an eminent Pali scholar, but also on account of his special qualification for taking up the scientific investigation of the vernaculars spoken in that province. He gladly accepted an appointment which, though holding out but a meagre emolument, opened up to him a virgin field of literary research thoroughly congenial to his mind. From the time that he set foot on Burmese soil at Christmas, 1878, till his death he worked unremittingly, the only break which occurred being in 1885, when his shattered constitution necessitated a temporary sojourn at Bangalore.

His attention was, in the first place, apart from the duties of his professorship, which entailed several hours' lecturing in class every day, directed to collecting information on the existing remains of Pali and vernacular literature in Lower Burma, for which purpose he travelled about during vacation, visiting the monasteries and temple libraries, taking inventories of their contents, and having the rarest and most interesting MSS. copied for Government. His classified list of the MSS. noted appeared in two editions in 1879 and 1882. In 1885 he had a new and much enlarged edition ready for the press, which, however, has not yet been printed. At the same time he supplied Mr. J. Jardine, then Judicial Commissioner of British Burma, with valuable translations from the Pali law codes for incorporation in his 'Notes on Buddhist Law,' which appeared in eight fasciculi at Rangoon in 1882 and 1883. He also wrote an appendix, containing notes and observations, to 'Maung Tet Pyo's Customary Law of the Chin Tribe,' published in Burmese and English at Rangoon in 1884, and worked at an elaborate essay—the Jardine prize—'On the Sources and Development of Burmese Law from the Era of the First Introduction of the Indian Law to the Time of the British Occupation of Pegu.' This treatise, on which Bishop Bigandet has passed the highest encomium, was printed at the Government Press, Rangoon, together with the text and translation of King Wagaru's 'Manu Dhammasattham,' in the following year. Dr. Forchhammer's labours as a member of the Educational Committee were at the same time most arduous and extensive, as the duty of editing the vernacular text-books approved of by the committee was thrust upon him and executed by him with scrupulous care.

Collaterally with the discharge of these various literary functions, he was constantly at work upon the scientific study of the other vernaculars—Talaing (now almost extinct), Shan, Karen, Kachin, Palaung, and others. He had planned a comparative dictionary of these languages; but the more important archaeological survey work with which he was entrusted by the Chief Commissioner on February 16th, 1882, made him set aside those purely philological labours. An article by him 'On the Indo-Chinese Languages' (in the Indian Antiquary for July, 1882), and a printed letter (August 17th, 1882) 'On the Languages and Dialects spoken in British Burma,' are the only tangible evidence of the progress he had made in that virgin field of research.

His familiarity, however, with Talaing and Burmese stood him in good stead in the decipherment of the ancient inscriptions to which he thenceforth directed his whole attention—so far, at least, as his other heavy official duties permitted him to do so. As an earnest of his archaeological investigations he brought out in 1883 and 1884 two treatises, entitled 'Notes on the Early History and Geography of British Burma.' A third fasciculus, which should have dealt with the Kalyani inscriptions, has, owing to his morbid fastidiousness, remained in manuscript. At the end of June, 1885, he had completed the archaeological survey of Arakan, and he returned to Rangoon with vast materials, both epigraphic and linguistic. His health had suffered, however, beyond retrieval from the treacherous climate of that province. That archaeological report, accompanied by numerous photographs, plans, and diagrams, has but recently been carried through the press. It comprises accounts of the Mahāmuni pagoda, of the Mrohaung temples, and of the Mahāti, Laung-gyet, Minbya, Uritauung, Akyab, and Sandoway pagodas.

Early in December, 1888, Forchhammer went to Pagan to make a survey of the famous temple ruins of that ancient city, and he stayed there for four months. Some of the results of his survey are recorded in a letter to the late Sir Henry Yule which appeared in Trübner's Oriental Record (3rd Series, vol. i. No. 1), and some further details will be found in vol. ii. No. 1, of the same serial. In a letter dated February 28th of the present year he expresses his regret at not having visited that jewel of Burman architecture at an earlier period, and he gives it as his opinion that the style of architecture peculiar to these temples must be traceable to Old Pagan (beyond Mandalay), the site of which he proposed to examine before printing off the last part of his report. He was still engaged in carrying the earlier portion of this great work through the press when death, brought on by over-exertion, laid him low.

It is to be hoped that the mass of epigraphic and linguistic material he has accumulated may be entrusted to competent hands for sifting, collating, and editing. But may also the authorities at Calcutta and Rangoon, when they proceed to fill up the appointments vacated through Forchhammer's premature death, realize the fact that they committed a grave mistake in placing on one man's shoulders burdens too heavy for two strong men to carry! R. R.

Literary Gossip.

THE late Bishop Lightfoot left behind him in MS. a large number of sermons. It is proposed to begin publishing, at intervals of two months at least, four volumes of these, viz. (1) 'Durham Historical Sermons,' (2) 'Auckland Sermons,' (3) 'Cambridge Sermons,' (4) 'St. Paul's Sermons.' The first named will be issued by Messrs. Macmillan & Co. early in June.

THE June Fortnightly will include an essay on 'Distinction' in style from the pen of Mr. Coventry Patmore.

A MOVEMENT has been started to buy Dove Cottage and the orchard garden where Wordsworth lived, and which remain almost untouched as they were in his time. It is proposed to put the place in trust, and to keep it as a memorial of Wordsworth's work. The whole may be acquired for £500., and an additional sum would set up a museum. A full account and other reasons for the purchase are given in a little book by Mr. Stopford A. Brooke, called 'Dove Cottage,' and published by Messrs. Macmillan & Co., to whom communications and subscriptions may be addressed.

THE Tablet to-day celebrates the fiftieth anniversary of its foundation. It is significant of the benefits conferred by converts on Roman Catholic journalism, as on other departments of Roman Catholic literature in England, that the Tablet was founded in 1840 by Mr. Frederic Lucas, M.P., an ex-Quaker, and the Weekly Register, nine years later, by Mr. Henry Wilberforce, an ex-Anglican; also that, until the present editorship, not one of the editors of the Tablet has been born a Roman Catholic.

THE library and collection of autographs of the late Mr. F. W. Cosens will be sold by auction by Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge during the season. The library includes a large number of scarce and valuable Spanish books, first quarto editions of Shakspeare's plays, first edition of Shakspeare's poems, the original drawings by H. K. Browne and Cruikshank to illustrate many of Dickens's works, also a remarkable series of works relating to wine. The autographs include an unusual number of Dickens's letters.

THE death of Lady Verney deserves mention in these columns, as her contributions to literature were numerous. 'Stone Edge,' which originally appeared in the Cornhill and was reprinted without the author's name, was an agreeable tale. 'Lilany Reef,' which she published in 1873, was a graceful and interesting story of Welsh life. 'Lettice Lisle' and her 'Sketches from Nature with Pen and Pencil' also merit praise. Latterly Lady Verney had paid a good deal of attention to the condition of peasant proprietors in France and other parts of the Continent, and her unfavourable views of the system found expression in the Nineteenth Century and in a volume entitled 'How the Peasant Owner Lives.' The last thing by this benevolent and accomplished lady that appeared in print was a brief letter questioning Mr. Gladstone's views of the social position of physicians in olden days. It was published in the Athenæum at Easter.

MR. NIMMO is going to issue a selection of 'Poems, chiefly Lyrical, from Romances and Prose-Tracts of the Elizabethan Age,' edited by Mr. A. H. Bullen; added to them are select poems of Nicholas Breton, &c.

LAST week a motion to suppress College was rejected at a meeting of the Governing Body of Westminster School by a majority of one vote. The conversion of Westminster into a prosperous day school is thus delayed, but only delayed, as the smallness of the majority is of itself sufficient to show.

MR. EDMUND GOSSE has set forth his recollections of Robert Browning in a volume of 'Personalalia,' which Mr. T. Fisher Unwin will publish. The preface will contain a letter of the poet's, and a frontispiece portrait will show Browning in his early manhood. The body of the work is divided into two sections, 'The Early Career of Robert Browning' and 'Personal Impressions.'

EARLY in the autumn Messrs. Macmillan & Co. will begin publishing in monthly volumes the new and complete edition of the works of Mr. Lowell, uniform with their recent edition of the works of Mr. Whittier.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. have in the press, and will shortly publish, a new edition of Mr. Rudyard Kipling's volume entitled 'Plain Tales from the Hills.' The same publishers will shortly add to their "Three-and-Sixpenny Series" a reprint of Sir Henry Cunningham's well-known novel 'Wheat and Tares.'

IN Lippincott's for June will be found the first of a series of 'Round Robin Talks,' reported by Mr. J. M. Stoddart, in which a mingled literary and humorous symposium of contributors to Lippincott's and other well-known writers is sketched. Among those who figure in it and are portrayed in characteristic woodcuts are Mr. Julian Hawthorne, Mr. John Habberton, and Mr. Edgar Fawcett.

THE Rev. Harry Jones will contribute a paper to the June issue of the Newbery House Magazine on 'Gambling.'

PROF. DOUGLAS, of the British Museum, contributes an article on 'The Origin of Chinese Culture and Civilization' to Lippincott's for June, which also contains an account of the late Mr. George H. Boker, an American dramatist, by Mr. R. H. Stoddard, giving personal details and unpublished correspondence.

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON & Co. will shortly issue a new series, entitled "The Idle Hour Series," each volume to contain short stories by well-known authors. Amongst the early volumes will be 'Nutshell Novels,' by Mr. Ashby Sterry; 'The Haunted Organist of Hurly Burly,' by Miss Rosa Mulholland; and 'Princess Fedor's Pledge,' by Mr. Manville Fenn.

MESSRS. FREDERICK WARNE & Co. have at press, and will shortly publish, a new novel entitled 'In the Sunlight,' by Miss Angelica M. Selby, author of 'On Duty.'

'ROBERT DRURY'S "JOURNAL IN MADAGASCAR"' will be the theme of the forthcoming volume in the "Adventure Series." Capt. Pasmore Oliver, of Madagascar fame, who is the editor, discusses at length in his preface the debated question of Drury's veracity, and enters very fully into an examination of the points for and against.

MR. RUDYARD KIPLING has placed the management of his literary affairs in the hands of Mr. A. P. Watt, of Paternoster Square.

M. JUSSEURAND, the author of 'English Wayfaring Life,' has revised and considerably augmented 'Le Roman au Temps de Shakespeare,' and a translation, by Miss Elizabeth Lee, of what is in a measure a new work will be published shortly by Mr. Fisher Unwin, under the title of 'The English Novel in the Time of Shakespeare.' The volume contains over sixty illustrations, consisting for the most part of reproductions of pictures from the mediæval romances.

MR. A. TAYLOR INNES, advocate, has been writing 'Church and State: a Historical Handbook,' which will be published by Messrs. Clark, of Edinburgh, before the end of this month.

THE English Committee for organizing the Oriental Congress of 1891 have issued a statement which we have no room to print this week, but hope to publish next. The scheme for a rival Congress at Oxford in 1892 seems to have already broken down. A number of those who signed the curious circular which appeared did so under a misapprehension of the facts of the case, and have withdrawn their support. It would be a pity to have two Congresses, and the small band of Dutch and German Orientalists who have hitherto held aloof would do well to join the 300 Orientalists who have agreed to support the London Congress.

THE various poems contributed on the occasion of the Beatrice Exhibition at Florence (the English portion of which was got together through the exertions of Miss Busk) are, it seems, to be published in a volume.

THE popular editions of Mr. Barnett Smith's 'Life of Mr. Gladstone' will in future be published by Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co. A new edition is now in the press, and will be ready for issue almost immediately.

THE first two volumes of 'Lothar Bucher's Leben und Werke,' edited by Ritter von Poschinger, are expected to be published very shortly. Herr Bucher, who was called "the right hand of Bismarck," had a remarkable career, and very few German journalists equalled him in elegance of style. The time of his political exile he mostly spent in London. Later on he became a member of the Bismarck ministry, from which he retired in 1886.

THE correspondence between Maximilian II. of Bavaria and the philosopher Schelling will shortly be issued under the editorship of the learned archivists Leist and Trost. The work is intended to form part of a documentary history of the king's reign, written by the editors of the correspondence.

THE Parliamentary Papers of most general interest this week are the Returns of the Accounts of the Metropolitan Water Companies for the year ending December 31st, 1888 (3d.); the first of a series of Returns relating to the Times of Arrival of Passenger Trains at the London Termini of certain Railway Companies (1d.); Papers relative to the Conference at Madrid on the subject of Industrial Property and Merchandise Marks, in continuation of C. 4837 of 1886 (6d.); and Trade and Navigation Accounts for April (7d.).

SCIENCE

THE PARIS OBSERVATORY.

ADMIRAL MOUCHEZ has issued his Rapport Annuel sur l'État de l'Observatoire de Paris for the year 1889. The edifice constructed for the great equatorial coudé has been completed, and a drawing of it accompanies the report. The instrument is 18 metres in focal length, and will be employed not only in direct observation of the stars, but also in the new departments of spectroscopy and photography, now of such extensive application in astronomical observations. The great reflector, 0^m 74 in aperture, originally intended for this building, is to be transferred to the observatory at Meudon, where the atmospheric conditions will be more favourable than at Paris for the full use of its power. The practical completion of the reobservation on the meridian of the stars of Lalande's Catalogue, which was commenced by Le Verrier nearly twenty-five years ago, will enable the observatory to devote more of its attention to spectroscopy, for which a special department is now to be organized. Five additional observatories have signified their intention of taking part in the great photographic survey of the starry heavens, and it is expected that the instrument in course of construction for this purpose at Paris will shortly be finished, and operations with it be commenced. The meridian observations have been less numerous than usual in consequence of the frequency of cloudy nights during 1889; they comprise not only the Lalande stars already mentioned, but other stars near planets and comets, the moon, and planets both large and small. Comets, nebulae, and occasional phenomena have, as usual, been well observed with the equatorials.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—May 8.—The President in the chair.—The following papers were read: 'On Certain Ternary Alloys,' Part II., by Dr. A. Wright and Mr. C. Thompson; 'Experiments on Vapour-density,' by Mr. E. P. Perman; 'On the Heating Effects of Electric Currents,' No. 4, by Mr. W. H. Preece; and 'On Barometric Oscillations during Thunderstorms, and on the Brontometer, an Instrument designed to facilitate their Study,' by Mr. G. J. Symons.

GEOGRAPHICAL.—May 12.—Right Hon. Sir M. E. Grant Duff, President, in the chair.—The following gentlemen were elected Fellows: Sir B. Griffith, Sir S. Shippard, Rear-Admiral F. Marten, Major F. R. Wingate, Messrs. H. W. Blundell, J. Chance, W. B. Cloete, J. H. Dauber, G. C. Denton, G. Draper, W. G. Elder, J. R. Fisher, A. Knox, C. Macdonald, H. Payn, and T. Thompson.—The paper read was 'The Karun River and the Commercial Geography of South-West Persia,' by Hon. G. Curzon.

ASTRONOMICAL.—May 9.—General Tennant, President, in the chair.—Messrs. J. W. Aldridge, T. W. Brownell, G. C. Cumes, F. Robbins, and G. Henderson were elected Fellows.—Mr. Knobel read a paper, by Prof. G. Davidson, 'On the Apparent Projection of Stars on the Bright Limb of the Moon at Occultations.' The paper gave rise to an interesting discussion.—Prof. Davidson was of opinion that the phenomena observed may be fully accounted for by the enlargement of the images of bright objects due to the unsteadiness of the atmosphere.—The opinion was not generally endorsed by the meeting.—Capt. Noble stated that red stars are more frequently seen to be projected on the lunar limb than others.—Mr. Knobel gave an account of a recent visit to the Potsdam Observatory, where he had seen the first photographic telescope which has been completed for carrying out the survey of the heavens recommended by the French Congress. He examined some photographs which have been taken with it, and found that the images were exceedingly sharp for a distance of a degree and a quarter from the centre of the plate. He also had an opportunity of examining Dr. Vogel's spectroscopic work, and reported that Dr. Vogel had within the last month found that the lines in the spectrum of Alpha Virginis are doubled at intervals of two days, proving the star to be a close double, the components of which revolve about their common centre of gravity in four days, thus adding another close binary to those already discovered by Prof. Pickering.—The following papers were taken as read: 'On the Proper Motion of Three Stars,' by Mr. W. T. Lynn; 'Observations of the Planets Victoria and Sappho, made with the Cambridge Transit Circle in the year 1889,' from Cambridge University; 'On the Orbit of δ Cygni,' by Mr. G. E. Gore; and 'Totality of the Eclipse of 1889, Dec. 22,' by Prof. D. P. Todd.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—May 8.—Dr. Evans, President, in the chair.—Mr. Grover exhibited two bronze celts found at Mitcham Junction, and five stone implements from various localities.—The latter were pronounced by the President and Mr. Franks to be clever modern forgeries made by some persons in Essex.—The executors of the late Mr. W. Wells exhibited a censer and incense ship, found some forty years ago when draining Whittlesey Mere.—The Hon. Sir S. Ponsbury Fane exhibited a silver flagon made in 1619, with added spout, given to Brynpton Church, Somerset, in 1637.—Mr. Wyon exhibited and communicated a paper on a silver-gilt cup, belonging to Mr. E. R. Wodehouse, bearing an inscription stating that it was one of three made for Sir Nicholas Bacon in 1574, out of the Great Seal of England, for each of his three houses, this one being for Redgrave. This seal, Mr. Wyon showed, was without doubt that of Philip and Mary.—The Rev. C. R. Manning stated that another of the three cups, that made for 'Stewkey,' was still preserved by Lord Townshend at Stiffkey, in Norfolk.—Lord Savile read a paper describing further excavations on the site of Lanuvium, resulting in the discovery of the fragments of a fine colonnade in front of the villa, in so perfect a condition that he had been able partly to reconstruct and set them up again. Some very perfect specimens of terra-cotta antefixæ of early Greek work have also been found.

ZOOLOGICAL.—May 6.—Prof. W. H. Flower, President, in the chair.—The Secretary read a report on the additions made to the menagerie during April, and called special attention to two examples of Simony's lizard (Lacerta simonyi) from the rock of Zalmo, Canaries, obtained by Canon Tristram, and presented to the Society by Lord Lilford.—Mr. Slater exhibited and made remarks upon the stuffed head of an antelope, shot by Commander R. A. J. Montgomery, R.N., of H.M.S. Boadicea, in June, 1889, near Malindi, on the East African coast, north of Zanzibar.—Mr. Slater referred this head to what is commonly called the Korrigum antelope (Damaliscus senegalensis).—Prof. H. H. Flower made remarks on a dissection of the cephalic skeleton of Hatteria, and pointed out some features of special interest exhibited by this specimen. These were the presence of a pro-atlas and the existence of vomerine teeth, as in Palæohatteria.—Two letters were read from Dr. Emin Pasha, dated Bagamoyo, March, 1890, and announcing that he had forwarded certain zoological specimens for the Society's acceptance.—Mr. H. Seebohm exhibited and made remarks on a specimen of the eastern turtle (Turtur orientalis), killed near Scarborough, in Yorkshire.—Communications and letters were read: by Prof. F. Jeffrey Bell, the first of a series of contributions to our knowledge of the antipatharian corals, the present communication containing the description of a particularly fine example of the black coral of the Mediterranean, and an account of a very remarkable antipathid from the neighbourhood of the island of Mauritius.—from Mr. E. N. Buxton, on the wild sheep and mountain antelope of the Algerian Atlas; these notes were illustrated by the exhibition of fine mounted specimens of the heads of these animals.—by Mr. K. Lydekker, on a remarkable specimen of an antler of a large deer from Asia Minor, which he was inclined to refer to an abnormal form of the red deer (Cervus elaphus).—by Mr. F. E. Beddard, on the minute structure of the eye in some shallow-water and deep-sea species of the Isopod genus Arcturus; he pointed out that in all the deep-sea forms there was some change in the visual elements which indicated degeneration.—by Mr. E. T. Newton, on the bones of some small birds obtained by Prof. Nation from beneath the nitrate beds of Peru; these bones seemed to occur in considerable abundance, and nearly all appeared to belong to one small species of petrel, which it was thought most nearly resembled Cymochorea leucorhoa or C. markhami, the latter of these being now found living on the coast of Chili.—from Dr. Mivart, on some singular canine dental abnormalities.—and by Mr. H. Elwes, on some new Indian moths.

ENTOMOLOGICAL.—May 7.—Capt. H. J. Elwes, V.P., in the chair.—Messrs. W. G. Blatch, F. J. S. Chatterton, C. Fenn, and G. B. Routledge were elected Fellows; and Mr. A. E. Stearns was admitted into the Society.—Mr. H. Goss, Secretary, read a letter from the vicar of Arundel, asking for advice as to the course to be taken to get rid of the larvae of a beetle which were destroying the beams of the parish church.—Mr. C. O. Waterhouse said he had already been consulted on the question, and had advised that the beams should be soaked with paraffin oil.—Dr. Sharp exhibited specimens of Caryoborus lacerdæ, a species of Bruchidae, and the nuts from which they had been reared. He stated that these nuts had been sent him from Bahia about six years ago, and that one of the beetles had recently emerged, after the nuts had been in this country for five years. Dr. Sharp also exhibited several specimens of Diptera collected by Mr. H. Smith in St. Vincent, and read a letter from him to Mr. Godman on the subject of the vast number of species of this order which he had recently collected in that island.—Mr. M'Lachlan, Dr. Mason, Mr. Waterhouse, and Capt. Elwes took part in the discussion which ensued.—Mr. R. F. Lewis, on behalf of Prof. W. M. Maskell, of Wellington, New Zealand, exhibited and read notes on about twenty-five species of Coccideæ from that colony. He also exhibited some specimens of the larvae and imago of Icerya purchasi, Maskell, obtained from Natal, where the species had proved very destructive to orange, lemon, and other fruit trees. He also showed specimens of the larvae of an allied species from Natal, originally assigned by Mr. Douglas to the genus Ortonia, but which Prof. Maskell was inclined to regard as a new species of Icerya.—Mr. M'Lachlan and the Chairman commented on the interesting nature of the exhibition, and the importance of a knowledge of the parasites of injurious insects, in connexion with which special mention was made of the researches and discoveries of Prof. Riley.—The Secretary exhibited, on behalf of Mr. T. D. A. Cockerell, of Colorado, a large collection of insect-galls, and read a letter from Mr. Cockerell on the subject.—Dr. Mason said he should be happy to take charge of these galls, with a view of rearing the insects and reporting the results.—Mr. H. W. Bates communicated a paper entitled 'On New Species of Cicindelidæ.'

MATHEMATICAL.—May 8.—Mr. J. J. Walker, President, in the chair.—The President announced that a member of the Society had asked to be allowed to give a donation of 500*l.* to the Society, the sum to be invested, or otherwise made use of, for the good of the Society. On the motion of Mr. A. B. Kempe (Treasurer), seconded by Mr. S. Roberts, the following resolution was carried unanimously: "That the cordial thanks of the London Mathematical Society be given to Lieut.-Col. J. R. Campbell for his generous gift of 500*l.* to the general fund of the Society."—The following communications were made: 'On the Function which denotes the Excess of the Divisors of a Number which is congruent to 1 (mod. 3) over those of a Number which is congruent to 2 (mod. 3), by Dr. Glaisher.—'A Table of Complex Multiplication Moduli,' by Prof. Greenhill.—'On Bicircular Quartics,' by Mr. R. Lachlan.—'On the Genesis of Binodal Quartic Curves from Conics,' by Mr. H. M. Jeffery.—and 'On the Arithmetical Theory of the Form $x^2 + ny^2 + n^2 z^2 - 3nxyz$,' by Prof. G. B. Mathews.

ARISTOTELIAN.—May 12.—Mr. S. H. Hodgson, President, in the chair.—Mr. A. Bontwood was elected a Member.—The subject originally announced for discussion having unavoidably fallen through, the President opened the evening's proceedings by reading a paper 'On the Ego.' The treatment of this question requires the combination of a philosophical analysis with a psychological one, an analysis of consciousness with an analysis of the conditions upon which its genesis depends. Consciousness, as we learn from philosophy, is the only evidence we have for the existence of anything whatever, including that of its own supporter or subject. The difficulty of the Ego question consists in this, that the perception of an agent or agency, as such, is never an immediate, but always an inferred or constructive perception. This is equally the case where the agent in question is our own self. And this difficulty is merely veiled, not removed, by calling the agent or agency immaterial, spiritual, transcendental, or by some similar name. These and such like terms do not give us that immediate knowledge which is our real desideratum, though they seem to do so by the mere fact that the names have a popularly admitted connotation. Now the particular phenomena in which we trace the union of the two—the subject and its consciousness—are the phenomena of volition, the consciousness of agency being rendered distinct only in and by the consciousness of a choice between alternatives, which are presented prior to the act which adopts one of them to the exclusion of the other. These are also the acts which (1) actually build up the character, (2) give us the sense of acting or not acting according to our better knowledge, and therefore (3) make us aware of our responsibility as moral beings, or persons in the full sense of the word.

SHORTHAND.—May 7.—Mr. E. Guest in the chair.—New members elected: E. J. Cross (Manchester), Associate; Señor Don Cuesta (Madrid), Foreign Associate.—Mr. H. Richter read a short paper 'On the Hair-Stroke' as used by G. S. Bordley, the first English script shorthand author, 1787.—A paper by Mr. W. H. Barlow (U.S.A.), Foreign Associate, was read by the honorary secretary, Mr. Pocknell, entitled 'Normal Phonography,' in which the author uses the horizontal stroke for the consonant k, and for the vowel e also; other vowels being written with hooks, &c., added to the horizontal stroke. The advantages of the method were set forth at length, increased legibility being claimed as the chief.

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.

- Mon. Victoria Institute, 8.—'Flint Implements and the Antiquity of Man.'
- British Architects, 8.—'German Technical Museums,' Mr. F. Granger.
- Society of Arts, 8.—'Sugar, Tea, Coffee, and Cocoa, their Origin, Preparation, and Uses,' Lecture IV., Mr. R. Bannister (Cantor Lecture).
- Tues. Royal Institution, 8.—'Mezzotint Engraving,' Mr. L. Fagan.
- Statistical, 7½.—'The Position and Prospects of Industrial Civilization,' Mr. L. L. Fyfe.
- Society of Arts, 8.—'The Industrial Arts of Japan,' Mr. A. L. Liberty.
- Civil Engineers, 8.—'Ballot for Members,' The Keewick Water-Power Electric Light Station, Messrs. Fawcett and Cowan.
- Zoological, 8½.—'Reported Discovery of Fossil Bones in a Cavern in Mauritius,' Sir R. Newton; 'New Toucan of the Genus Ferganensis,' Mr. F. L. Sclater; 'Remains of some Large Extinct Birds from the Cavern Deposits of Malta,' Mr. R. Lydekker; 'Modifications of certain Organs which seem to be illustrations of the Inheritance of Acquired Characters in Mammals as in Birds,' Dr. H. Gadow.

- Wed. Meteorological, 7.—'Rainfall of the Globe, Comparative, Chronological,' Mr. W. B. Tripp; 'Mutual Influence of Two Pressure Plates upon Each Other, and Comparison of the Pressures upon Small and Large Plates,' and 'Variations of Pressure caused by the Wind blowing across the Mouth of a Tube,' Mr. W. H. Dines.
- Microscopical, 8.—'Micrometric Measurements with the Microscope,' Mr. E. M. Nelson.
- Society of Arts, 8.—'The Mannesmann Process for making Seamless Tubes,' Mr. J. G. Gordon.
- British Archaeological Association, 8.—'Early Inscribed Altar Slab at Sheepscote,' Mr. U. J. Davis; 'Recently Discovered Saxon Architecture at Stevington Church, Beds,' Mr. E. F. Loftus Brock.
- Thurs. Royal Institution, 3.—'Flame and Explosives,' Prof. Dewar.
- Royal, 4½.
- Electrical Engineers, 8.
- Antiquaries, 8½.—'Examples of Ancient Wood-work, chiefly from Somerset Churches,' Mr. C. H. Woodruff; 'Processional Cross of Crystal and Silver-gilt,' Chancellor Ferguson; 'History of West Appropriation in Churches,' Mr. W. J. Hardy.
- Fri. United Service Institution, 3.—'The Training of the German Cavalry in comparison with that of the English,' Maj. or J. C. K. Fox.
- London Amateur Scientific Society, 8.—'Stromboli and Vulcan,' Mr. L. W. Fulcher.
- Royal Institution, 8.—'Manners and Customs of the Torres Strait Islanders,' Prof. A. C. Haddon.
- Sat. Royal Institution, 3.—'Excavating in Greece,' Dr. C. Wald.
- Linnean, 3.—'Anniversary Meeting.'

Science Gossip.

A WORK of great importance is, we learn, projected by Mr. C. Davies Sherborn. He commences in June next an 'Index Generum et Specierum Animalium,' which is to date from the twelfth edition of Linnaeus's 'Systema,' and to close December 31st, 1889. It will include both living and fossil forms. The importance of such a reference book will be patent to every zoologist, and we understand that Prof. Flower, Dr. Günther, and Dr. Woodward have promised space for the storage of the MS. in the Natural History Museum; this will practically ensure safety from fire, and render the work accessible for reference while still imperfect. We heartily wish Mr. Sherborn health and strength to complete this monumental work; he must not expect that it will demand less than fifteen years' labour.

At a meeting held in Manchester on Monday last, under the presidency of the Mayor, in reference to the proposed monument in memory of the late Dr. Joule, it was decided that the execution of the statue should be entrusted to Mr. Alfred Gilbert, A.R.A.

The death of Mr. Nasmyth ought to have been chronicled by us last week. The steam-hammer caught the public fancy almost more effectually than any other invention of the century, and the career of its inventor has been so excellently described by Dr. Smiles that it would be superfluous to relate it. We need only say that Mr. Nasmyth's contributions to astronomy were by no means so valuable as his achievements as a mechanical engineer. It is on what he achieved in the first fifty years of his life that his fame will rest, and that fame is secure.

FINE ARTS

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.—THE ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTIETH EXHIBITION IS NOW OPEN. —5, Pall Mall East, from 10 till 6.—Admission 1*s.*; Catalogue, 1*s.* ALFRED D. FRIPP, R.W.S., Secretary.

THE LEGEND OF THE BRIAR ROSE, painted by E. BURNES JONES, A.R.A.

THE LEGEND OF THE BRIAR ROSE.—THE EXHIBITION OF MR. BURNES JONES'S Four Pictures IS NOW OPEN at Messrs. Thos. Agnew & Sons' Old Bond Street Galleries, 59, Old Bond Street, W.—Admission, 1*s.* 10 to 6 o'clock.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

(Second Notice.)

THIS exhibition does not improve on acquaintance, although there are several admirable works besides those we have already described, and the general average of merit is undoubtedly higher than usual. It is painfully evident that lack of studies and research, and the absence of sense of style which we have deplored in noticing the Grosvenor Exhibition and the New Gallery, are only too common in Burlington House, and that at least one-third of the pictures have no claim whatever to the honour of public exhibition which, with a generosity injurious to all concerned, the Academicians gratuitously bestow upon them. Nearly all the best works by men whose position is already achieved having been criticized, we may next consider the other noteworthy figure pictures and portraits, good and bad, grouping each artist's works.

MR. SEYMOUR LUCAS.

In Gallery I. we come upon a good piece of somewhat old-fashioned humour by this clever artist, which seems due to recollections of a group of Dutch Regents or trustees of a hospital, often painted by Hals, Van der Helst, or Rembrandt. Called The Loving Cup (No. 4), it depicts six elderly beaux at table, of whom two in the centre are exchanging the quaintest courtesies with that curious mock sentiment which has always been characteristic of ceremonial dinners. The work is bright, and touched with more firmness and crispness than usual. Exceptionally good is the great silver bowl in the middle of the table. It is a far better picture than the more ambitious and much over-praised Louis XI. (291), by Mr. Lucas, where that paragon of statecraft is flattering a French peasant by attentions to his wife and children. The design is a commonplace melodrama of essentially cheap materials, cleverly put together and rather flimsily painted. In short, it is such a picture as Mr. Lucas has frequently produced before, and possesses few of the superior qualities of No. 4. We do not admire his portraits, Nos. 800 and 878, so highly as we could wish.

MR. G. A. STOREY.

This artist's many friends rejoice over The Hungry Messenger (5), not only because it almost justifies their praise of his former works, but because it promises improvement for the future. To us it seems the best thing he has done. The scene is the breakfast parlour of a squire or justice of the peace in Puritan times. A messenger has brought a letter, which the squire, who is sitting at his breakfast, reads without offering refreshments to the new-comer, whose modesty almost fails to control his fingers. The subject is neither valuable nor difficult, but the treatment is clever, the touch is neater and firmer than usual (that is to say, the artist has taken unusual pains with the execution of his work), the colour is brighter, and the lighting is clearer, but no great amount of care is observable in the details. Far less fortunate is Paris and Enone (519). In dealing with such a topic Mr. Storey is obviously out of his depth. The only portion of the work which can be said to be successful is some of the distant parts of the landscape background.

MR. R. W. MACBETH.

The Council of the Royal Academy must have on more than one occasion sorely vexed the spirit of Chantrey when they spent the money he bequeathed for the encouragement of art of the finest kind upon pictures of a popular character, which were sure to find purchasers, while learned and beautiful art went a-begging. It cannot be imagined for a moment that Mr. Macbeth's picture, The Cast Shoe (19), is above the level of popular taste, and certainly Chantrey would never have bought it. Nevertheless the Academicians have purchased as an example of fine art of the day this bright and sunny sketch of a lumbering cart-horse standing for examination by a smith, while other persons look on, including one of those buxom country wenches no one paints better than Mr. Macbeth. The charms of the picture lie in its gay illumination and coloration; its shortcomings are thinness, defective drawing, weak modelling, and looseness of touch throughout. Sheep-dipping in the Fens (856) is nearly equal to Mr. Macbeth's second-rate work, and as a picture it is better than No. 19.

MR. E. LONG.

Rossetti's friends know well what would be that master's verdict upon this accomplished

Academician's notion of La Pia de' Tolomei, embodied in No. 26 before us. It is needless to say that Rossetti would not have given the world such a version of La Pia, who bade the wayfarers in Purgatory remember her melancholy fate. Nevertheless, this sad woman in black, standing with her hands clasped together, and apparently gazing steadfastly at the poets she appealed to, is one of Mr. Long's best conceptions, and far better than the boneless nudities and semi-nudities we expect from him. The still intensity of the expression may, it is true, mean much, or it may mean nothing at all. That depends upon what the spectator sees in the face. But the attitude is good, the technique, though slight, is clever, and the colour is acceptable. Mr. Long's portrait of Mrs. M'Corquodale and Children (486) is thinly painted, and no part of it is thoroughly drawn; still its colour is pleasing, and the little girl's face has a charming expression. If Col. Sanderson (689) had more fibre the likeness would be better.

MR. J. B. BURGESS.

We are strongly reminded of M. V. Cheviard by Mr. J. B. Burgess's diploma picture, Freedom of the Press (337), a satire on Parisian Church politics. A curé has been reading to his fellow a fierce and irreverent article against their order, and, with glowing eyes, looks at his companion, who lifts his hands in horror and appeals to Heaven for justice. The faces are first rate, and the picture is more daintily and firmly touched than usual. The black robes are a little too hard and positive; more greyness and warmth would improve their somewhat unmitigated nigritude. The same painter's interior of a studio with figures, which he calls The Sculptor (270), appears to be meant to represent Michael Angelo, before Torrigiano broke his nose, contemplating that group of the 'Virgin and Child' which at Bruges is fondly ascribed to him. The design is weak, and although the execution is more equal and careful than is usual with Mr. Burgess, it is as a whole not up to his mark.

HEER VAN BEERS.

While dealing with the portraits we shall notice Heer Jan van Beers's 'Henri Rochefort' (879). At present let us praise A Smile (886), a charming figure of a dashing and beautiful cocotte in a costume of the Directoire, mainly red and black, leaning forward with both elbows on her knees, and looking up to us with all the charm of a saucy, laughing face. The deftness, spirit, and precision of the painter's touch, the extreme delicacy of his modelling, the clearness of his shadows and the brilliancy of his lights, combining as they do with the breadth, homogeneity, and simplicity of his chiaroscuro, are the despair of many artists, who aver that, somehow or other (they do not know how), Heer van Beers must owe much to photography. We look only at the outcome of his skill, and do not pretend to understand his processes. Admitting (but for argument's sake alone) that the animated figure and face of this girl were traced from a photograph such as we never saw—who know only the deadly-lively things that illustrate what is called "art in photography"—the difficulty is still unsolved, because we must next discover how (and most certainly it was not by photography) the exquisite surface inexhaustible details, brilliant expression, and broad effect of the little gem before us were obtained. Whoso achieved these things could likewise make the design and the outline. In spite of all this, so strong are the suspicions of many capable painters that doubts will probably never cease till the author of 'A Smile' condescends to paint something of the kind in public.

MR. ORCHARDSON.

As a diploma work No. 337 is more worthy of the occasion and creditable to the painter than Mr. Orchardson's On the North Foreland (338), a somewhat thin and empty picture of a lean girl walking with her back to the wind near the edge of the cliff. It is so ill designed as to leave us in doubt whether she is going to jump over or be blown over into the sea. The spectator is not interested in her fate, and this indicates a grave fault in the picture. Mr. Orchardson cannot really afford to exhibit examples so devoid of studies as this, which, as a diploma work, will gibbet him for ever on the walls of Burlington House. Mr. Burgess is at once wiser and more generous than his brother Academician.

MR. H. WOODS.

On the Riva of the Giudecca (49) is Mr. H. Woods's best contribution of the year, a bright view of the canal, with figures (of a kind we are quite weary of) of market girls gossiping and playing as usual. In The Shade of the Scuola, San Rocco (51), is one of those thoroughly mannered pictures by which the clever artist illustrates the decay of Venice, and the presence, amid her glories of architecture and of other forms of art, of an ignorant, semi-barbarous populace, whose picturesque costumes and primitive manners command the interest of the painter. The shadows are black, as they are in photographs rather than in nature. La Promessa Sposa (278) again introduces girls gossiping at the side of a canal. There is spirit in the figures, and the vista is good in its way; but the mannerisms of the painter are manifest in his constant use of blue garments and the corresponding elements of a chromatic scheme which has become tiresome by repetition, and was never worth very much.

MINOR SENTIMENTAL AND GENRE PICTURES.

In the Venetian Fruit-Seller (735) of M. L. Malempré, Mr. Woods may see himself reflected to the life, with all his shortcomings exaggerated, all his mannerisms emphasized, and the detestable blue petticoat at its worst. Still M. Malempré, although he designs quite as well as his model, cares less for his art than Mr. Woods, and pays little attention to the draughtsmanship, finish, and atmosphere of his pictures. —The Young Duchess (59) of Mr. H. Schmalz, a courtesan in powder and patches, is painty and meretricious. —Mrs. Merritt's Love Locked Out (32) is a study of a rough sort. The motive is worn threadbare, and pretends to a beauty in nature and in art which it does not possess. —Mr. Godward's Pompeian Bath (42) is his most acceptable picture, because it is least successful in imitating a Tadema. A nude girl, fairly well drawn and smoothly painted, is standing, not ungracefully, erect in a marble chamber. The right arm is much too small. —The First Words of Love (67) of Mr. Perugini is an indifferent version of what Mr. F. Dicksee produces when looking too attentively at the art of Sir F. Leighton. The lovers are most tender and sentimental, but they seem to have no bones. —The Mignon (182) of Mrs. Stanhope Forbes, a French girl in white, sits on a table with a mandolin before her, and has at her feet a portfolio of prints. Her gentle face and graceful air are winning. The picture would be better if its perspective were less sharp. —Mrs. Alma Tadema's The Pet Goldfinch (188) reminds us pleasantly of a Dutch seventeenth century interior, and is a good broad study of interior light, colour, and tone. —Mr. Pettie's best picture of the year is No. 302, "The World went very well then," a lane scene in which a showy girl is followed by a young admirer ambitious of giving her a bouquet. His nervousness and her insouciance are well conceived. The sparkling light and colour are worthy of praise, the figures are dashing treated, but, as usual with the painter, there is a disagreeable and almost universal sub-tint of somewhat rank yellow, and the execution is thin, the modelling by no means searching. —The Garden Flowers (328), a lady in a pleasance, is a comparatively unimportant example of the taste of Mr. M. Stone, with nothing, except its small size, to distinguish it from its fore-runners by the same hands.

Coarsely painted as is Mr. J. R. Reid's Waterman's Wife (413), it is less coarse and vulgar than his recent contributions to the Grosvenor; but the background is bedaubed, and it needs much more refining to become worthy of its place here, or, indeed, of exhibition at all. The Young Squire (804) is less objectionable, and if largely repainted and technically refined would be welcome as a third-rate piece of genre. —The Homeless (24) of Mr. T. B. Kennington proves that he has unwisely continued to work that lugubrious vein which can only be turned to account by a masculine painter. The best master of this sort of art is M. Pelez, of Paris, to whose famishing boys, self-asphyxiated ouvriers, and other illustrations of appalling misery, we call the attention of Mr. Kennington, if he seriously desires to make our blood run cold. Notwithstanding his cardinal mistake of attempting subjects he touches only the outside of, he paints well enough to do better, if not more sincere things; but at best he is a poor colourist, and fails to make, as a master might, good colour with his favourite black, raw umber, and dirty white.

For want of a better classification we must here name Miss E. F. Harrison's crude and ill-painted child's head, No. 354. The mouth is vicious, and the eyes are too big. Such coarse work ought not to be on the line. The lady has much to learn, and her taste needs refining before she will be fit to paint from a motto of Rossetti's. —Mr. Pepys Cockerell went too far when he gave to his pretty piece of sentimentality, No. 381, the title of Orpheus and Eurydice. It represents a comely young gentleman, with a nice moustache and neatly fitting coat, playing on a piano, while the radiant spirit of his wife or mistress stands at his side. The piano, though hard, is cleverly painted. —The Linda (383) of Mr. C. L. Burns must be called sentimental, because the face of a young girl with red hair, and expressing nothing in particular, can belong to no other category than the meaningless. She is in white, and holds a pot of white and yellow chrysanthemums. It is a feverish example of that half-educated art which, as a teaching body, the Academy ought to set its face against. It possesses no merit except the "quality" of the flesh in relation to its colour and the light; in the hair there are objectionable tinges of saffron and blood-red. —The pathos of Mr. G. F. Watts's picture (437) of an old white horse turned out to pick up his living in a rough waste is displayed in his shrunken limbs, hollow back, and humble air. A Patient Life of Unrewarded Toil is thus epitomized. The colour of the soiled hide is worthy of the master who has brought the whole into Venetian harmonies of colour and tone. —Mr. J. Sant is, even in portraiture, fond of sentiment, and he is not always quick to see the line which divides that fine quality from sentimentality. His Oliver Twist walking to London (507) ought to have been hung at the side of Mr. Kennington's 'Homeless' (24), to which we have already referred, because much the same mistake has been made by both artists; yet 'Oliver Twist' is the better picture, because its somewhat squalid tragedy is more sincere and spontaneous than that of 'Homeless.' The misery of Oliver trudging on his way is duly accentuated by his limping gait, his leanness, pallor, and worn look, and the stoniness of the road. There is not much difference in the technique of these pictures: that of Mr. Sant is the sounder and the firmer; on the other hand, it is so mannered that it is quite impossible to hope that Mr. Sant will improve, whereas it would be hard to guess what Mr. Kennington may do in future.

Pity my Simplicity (577), by Mr. St. G. Hare, is a naked child kneeling at a bedside, praying with arms folded on her breast, a doll lying across her knees. It is spontaneous, pretty, and natural; the modelling of the flesh is good, but it is deficient in rosiness. —Mr. C. B. Barber's Sweethearts (580), a pretty young girl exchanging affectionate caresses with her collie, is painted in a neat, "genteel," and pleasing manner, so as to be worthy of comparison with Mr. Sant's best style, which it closely resembles. —Who takes the Cake? (626) is another dog picture, but, although it is by a lady, it is a much more masculine design. Miss F. Moody has not looked at Landseer's 'Jack in Office' without profit, and she has designed and painted a capital group of dogs of various kinds meditating an attack on a cake. They possess some pathos, much humour, and true spirit; each dog is well studied, drawn, modelled, and painted, but as a whole they need to be "got together," as artists say, in the main lines of the group, as well as by massing the colours and tones severally. —The School-boy (655), by Mr. E. S. Harper, is decidedly good and true in character. —Mr. F. W. W. Topham is more sentimental than usual in his In the Mouth of Mary (665). The motive is weak; some of the figures are pretty, but nothing more, and they seem to be all of one type of character. The picture pleases by its neatness, clear lighting, and indications of a sense of colour not yet fully developed. —Mr. R. Lehmann's Undine (726), seated in the dim depths of the river, is of a most watery complexion. Apart from this, her legs ought to have been better drawn, and there is nothing in sub-aqueous nature which requires the genius of a painter to resemble a sick schoolgirl. —Far below his mark is Mr. Heywood Hardy's Love's Stratagem (743), in which a somewhat flabby but genteel youth surreptitiously gives a letter to his mistress, who is represented as a little girl! The horses are better than the human figures; the dogs are better still. The landscape has been carefully studied, although it is less completely worked out than we should like. Mr. Hardy never before designed with so little vigour.

La Sposa (757) of Mr. S. M. Fisher is a noteworthy example of a class of pictures which has become numerous within the last few years, and owes not a little of its attractiveness to the studies of many able Frenchmen, such as M. Dagnan-Bouveret, in the "qualities" of tone and their relationship to colour at large, or the coloration of pictures as distinct from the brightness, purity, and harmony of local colours proper, when acting and reacting upon one another. The neighbouring 'Tulip Culture' (750) of Mr. G. Hitchcock, and 'The Last Blessing' (758) of Mr. C. Tayler are different, and furnish somewhat of a contrast to No. 757; still they are cognate illustrations of studies of the "qualities" of tone and colour, and they should be examined with due regard to 'La Sposa.' Apart from its finely studied tonality, and the breadth and richness of its colour, 'La Sposa' is a disappointing picture, because of its awkward composition, the disproportions of the figures, and the lack of massing of the local colours, which are needlessly isolated, so that the work, despite the simplicity of its light and shade, is spotty. —To The Last Blessing (758) Mr. C. Tayler has imparted great breadth, combined with homogeneity and rare depth and richness of tone. He excels in painting dimly lighted interiors in a way M. Dagnan-Bouveret would not be ashamed of. The scene is a cottage bedroom with white walls and hangings, where the silvery dawn is entering, but has not yet gathered strength enough to cast shadows of its own, nor disturb the impressive mystery of the effect. A youth lies dying; his mother supports him, while his rough father, a fisherman, kneels praying near the bed. At his feet stands a priest (whose black dress tells finely in the chiaroscuro of the picture), and holds up a crucifix before the sufferer. The design is of the simplest; the expressions are touching and natural, while they show reserve of power; and the effect is as true as it is apt, pathetic, and poetic. Every part has been thoroughly studied, made expressive of the subject, and brought into harmony with the rest of the picture. —In How Lisa loved the King (774) Mr. E. B. Leighton has painted neatly, but somewhat weakly, a most sentimental subject. He is an accomplished craftsman, an adept in all the schools can teach, who, as his humorous picture of last year proved, is better able to deal with sportive subjects than with romantic themes. —The Greek Girl (799) by Mr. H. D. Chadwick is a piece of quasi-classic genre of the kind which the genius and skill of Mr. Alma Tadema have made popular. It belongs to the same class as Mr. Godward's 'Pompeian Bath' (42) noticed above. It is, in a delicate, elaborate, yet mechanical way, an imitation of a Tadema such as a clever student like Mr. Chadwick ought to avoid.

A capital piece of colour, tender, pearly, and yet glowing, admirable for its atmosphere and the choiceness of its subtly graded tones, is Mr. E. A. Waterlow's Friends or Foes? (937), a girl and a child threatened by geese in a public road, part of a charming English landscape. The design is extremely spirited and apt. The picture as a whole is incomparably finer than anything we have hitherto had from the artist, who has till now indulged in an excess of paint. —The "illustration" which Lady Butler calls Evicted (993) shows how cleverly she can "pile up the agony" of her subject, but it lacks all the fine technical qualities of No. 937, and is happiest in the scenic character of the background, a mountain landscape, and the fitness of it to the theatrical aspect and character of the single figure. —The picture of Mr. T. S. Cooper —which is unmitigated prose, but beautiful in its sincerity and veracity—hangs close to this melodrama, as if to show the other side of the technical question. This work is the latest achievement of the doyen of the Academy, who is in his eighty-seventh year, but has not lost the firmness of his touch, clearness of his vision, or his patience in dealing with those multifarious details he from the first has delighted in. Called Casualties in the Hunting Field (1004), it gives a wide panorama of roads, shaws, ploughed fields, and distant meadows, painted with wonderful precision, and, in the distant parts at least, with breadth, tenderness, and veracity. Some of the men and horses are conspicuously unfortunate, but whose turns to study the Crome-like painting of the elegant trees so ably grouped in the middle distance, the crispness and astonishing care and good art displayed in the fence slanting across the picture, and experiences the charm of the far-off meadows on our left, will gladly join us in congratulating the painter on this his crowning achievement, and in hoping he may continue to work in a way which—we need not say why—pleases more than anything we have seen of his.

Conspicuously artistic is Mr. C. Hayes's snow-piece called Three Miles to the Fair (1042), a caravan and mountebanks halting by the wayside at evening. Although egregiously painty, it is a capital rendering of air, twilight, and colour. More searching care and a refined technique would make a fine picture of what is now not much better than a good sketch by a clever observer of nature at large. —M. E. de Blaas is almost himself in the humorous and spirited Scandal (1062). The design is of exceptional spirit. The most audacious of our old acquaintances among Mr. de Blaas's Venetian wenches, a strapping brunette, chaffs her bashful lover, who, slyly smiling as he looks down and trifles with his hat, knows himself to be, after all, master of the situation, while the rest of the girls enjoy the sport most heartily. A little less firm in touch and delicate in colour, this work is as well designed and spirited as any by the clever painter, who, better than most men, knows how to compose his figures and design their dresses, colours, gestures, and expressions.—“John Anderson my jo, John!” (1089), by Mr. E. E. Simmons, belongs to the category in which Mr. Chevallier Taylor's ‘Last Blessing’ and ‘La Sposa’ of Mr. S. Melton Fisher are conspicuous. Like the latter, it deserves a much better place than above the line, where it is not easy to see more than the breadth, good effect, and true attitudes of the work. It is a capital example of what is called the Newlyn School, which is really that of Rembrandt occupied with modern subjects, chiaroscuro, tone, and the “qualities” of the latest Parisian fashion. Thus managed, we welcome this fine work of art, which, although it has dangers of its own, combines sincere sentiment with a sound technique, and rejects the rude vagaries of the Impressionists.

Next week we shall deal with the genre pictures of an historical and humorous character, and we may conclude this article by mentioning Dinah Morris Preaching (18), by Mr. C. Gregory; The Golden Lure (202), by Mr. R. Sauber, a life-size nudity standing on a globe, designed and painted in the manner of Signor Falero; and Mr. E. Radford's Message of Histieus (222).

THE SALON.

(First Notice.)

Two distinct exhibitions of fine arts co-exist in Paris this year. The Société des Artistes Français, which opened its doors to the public on the 2nd of May, occupies its old rooms in the Palais de l'Industrie; and the Société Nationale—such is the name adopted by the protesting party—has installed itself in one of the buildings that have remained standing on the Champ de Mars since the Great Exhibition. The latter (the Société Nationale) opened on the 15th of May to the public. Although the artists who exhibit at the Champ de Mars are comparatively few, several men of the greatest merit and distinction are numbered in their ranks, and the members of the new society are allowed to send in a greater number of pictures than in the old official Salon. The result of this is that works of real merit stand out in stronger relief and will produce more effect than they could do under the old regulations.

It is already clear that the recent quarrel and division among our artists has considerably impoverished the section of painting at the Palais de l'Industrie. The absence of painters like Meissonier, Carolus Duran, Puvis de Chavannes, Delaunay, Gervey, Duez, Dagnan-Bouveret, Roll, Gustave Moreau, and Cazin cannot fail to make itself felt. In sculpture, on the other hand, the number of “separatists” was exceedingly small, and consequently the Société des Artistes Français will—in that important branch, at least—hold its own, and more than its own, against its rival. The Catalogue of the exhibition contains 5,301 numbers; that of 1889 contained 5,810. Last year 2,700 paintings were catalogued. This year we have 2,480. The numerical difference is so trifling that it is not as regards quantity that a falling-off can be said to have taken place. It would rather appear that the jury, in order to hide the gaps made by the retreat of the dissenting party, was determined to fill the rooms at all costs, and it is, therefore, not surprising that the élite, lost in such a crowd, should appear rather insignificant. As in former years, we see great expenditure of talent and many interesting pictures and studies, but few works of great power and originality, rising above others so as to attract and arrest attention irresistibly. It is only fair to add, however, that the public is still under the impression made by the Universal Exhibition, the extraordinary brilliancy of which makes the Salon of 1890 appear somewhat cold and colourless.

Three huge compositions by MM. Munkacsy, Henri Lévy, and Jules Lefebvre fill one half of the great salon carré. M. Munkacsy's Allégorie de la Renaissance Italienne (1764) is a ceiling about a hundred mètres square, intended for the museum of the History of Art in Vienna. Within a vast portico, surmounted by a cupola which rests on rose-coloured marble columns, the great Italian masters of the sixteenth century are assembled and grouped. Lionardo da Vinci steps forward by the side of Raphael; Titian, in the midst of his pupils, makes a discourse on aesthetics before some goddess who poses in Olympian nudity; Veronese is at work on a gigantic canvas; Michael Angelo stands apart, absorbed in thought. Above the rest, in a sort of loggia, Pope Julius II. is looking at some architectural designs. From the top of the cupola, which opens out to the blue sky, Fame and Glory are seen descending, the first blowing her trumpet, and the other holding out the palm which is to be the victor's reward. Nothing can be more unlike M. Munkacsy's former works than this picture. This time he has cleansed his palette of all sombre or violent tones, and distributed light and open air over the whole composition. He has confined himself to the clear and vivid tones suitable to decorative painting, and at the same time has lost nothing of his masterly colouring and vigorous touch. His ceiling, hung on the wall like any other picture, is now seen under the most unfavourable conditions; the perspective and proportions are either topsy-turvy or utterly destroyed, so that it requires a great mental effort to put all things back into their proper place. But when it is seen as it is meant to be, from the bottom upwards, and at an elevation of some fifteen or twenty mètres, this composition will certainly produce a very fine effect.

M. Henri Lévy likewise exhibits a ceiling, La Liberté (1506), which is to decorate one of the rooms of the Hôtel de Ville in Paris. The picture was ordered by the Municipal Council, who also chose its theme as follows: “La Ville de Paris offre à la Liberté triomphante le sacrifice de ses enfants tués en combattant pour elle.” The city of Paris is personified by a woman, standing upright on a barricade, surrounded by the dead and the dying, and lifting one arm towards heaven, whence—from a very long way off—Liberty is seen advancing in a chariot. M. Henri Lévy is an undoubted colourist, and the ensemble of his picture is harmonious; but he treats allegorical subjects after the style of the last century, and the female figure which he shows us in a noble attitude, draped in a long violet robe and leaning against a blazoned escutcheon, is but an imperfect symbol of a great democratic city torn by divisions and civil war.—M. Jules Lefebvre has allowed himself to be tempted by the legend of Lady Godiva (1437). He has represented, on a long and high canvas, the deserted street of a town of the Middle Ages, whose quaint projecting houses leave only a small patch of sky visible. An old woman in a grey gown and white head-gear is leading by its bridle a large grey horse, upon which is seated a naked, shivering woman, her eyes cast down and her arms modestly folded over her bosom. We cannot fail to recognize the master's correct drawing and delicate taste in this picture, but the pose of his chief figure is not free from mannerism, and the unnatural pallor of the flesh makes it doubtful whether Lady Godiva is trembling with chaste emotion or simply shivering with cold.

M. Bouguereau has this year discarded allegorical figures, and has given us Les Saintes Femmes au Tombeau (299) and Petites Mendiantes (300). The first picture is remarkable for the general ordering of the composition as well as for the purity of the drawing and the nobleness of the female figures. The second shows us two young girls whose native distinction and elegance form a strange contrast with the rags in which they are clothed. Both subjects are treated with unimpeachable correctness and cold perfection. A critic once reproved M. Bouguereau for his “lack of inexperience.” This time again we feel that the skill of a hand almost too sure of itself and the finish of execution have left no room for sentiment or emotion.

M. Benjamin-Constant has contributed a nude female figure which, if not faultless as to style and modelling, has given the artist a fresh opportunity for painting in warm tones a lion's skin, an Eastern carpet, a Turkish sword, and a Persian faïence dish (Victrix, 159). But M. B. Constant was doubtless weary of Eastern scenes and of the effects of light on rich stuffs and draperies, for he has also sent in a sort of grisaille bearing the title of Beethoven, la Sonate au Clair de Lune (158). He has imagined the master sitting at his piano and playing his composition before a few friends in a dark room, lighted only by one pale ray of moonlight. The figures are no more than dark grey shadows, faintly outlined on an intensely dark background. A whitish streak along the edge of the piano is all the light we see in the picture, and the only bit of colouring is a violoncello standing against a chair in the foreground. We receive no distinct impression from this work, which may be considered as the mistake of a man of talent.

Official painting is represented by M. Sadi-Carnot, Président de la République, à Agen (1620), by M. Henri Martin. The artist has given colossal proportions to a subject which he has otherwise meagrely treated and failed to make interesting. On a public place of no special character the President is seen sitting in his landau, surrounded by half a dozen official personages. Some gendarmes are keeping back—with no great difficulty—a few lifeless individuals who represent the crowd. M. Martin aimed at rendering the glare of a summer day in the South, but his painting has fallen short of his programme; he has suppressed lights and shadows from his canvas, and failed to let in real sunshine.—On the other hand, we find much life and movement and sunlight in the work of M. Ulpiano Checa, a new-comer, Course de Chars Romains (517). A circus filled with animated spectators, some Roman chariots launched at full gallop, one of which is overturned—such is the subject treated by M. Checa, in somewhat violent and heavy tones, but with much verve and spirit and much acquired cleverness, which, however, does not exclude natural gifts. M. Checa is a pupil of the Academy of Madrid; he sent a picture to the Champ de Mars last year which did not attract much notice.

M. J. P. Laurens has painted on a chevalet canvas Les Sept Troubadours (1392) discussing the statutes of the Academy of Floral Games. Seven figures, draped in long crimson robes, with hoods of the same colour closely fastened about their heads, are seated under some fine old trees in a garden flooded with warm light. The flowers in this garden, and the roofs of the building which shuts in the view on one side of the picture, are in the same red tones as the figures. This fantasy of a colourist is firmly and broadly executed. M. Laurens has not unfrequently taken a larger canvas than usual without giving us a more important subject; in this case the size of the canvas is proportioned to the episode he wished to represent, and his small picture has qualities both of life and of charm.

M. François Flameng has also confined himself to small space in his two military scenes, La Halte, Infanterie de Ligne, 1789, and L'Armée Française marche sur Amsterdam, 1796 (919 and 920). His drawing is clear and crisp, his touch extremely fine, and his perception of colours remarkably true. For some time past M. Flameng had been at work on great historical subjects treated in the style of decorative painting and intended for the new Sorbonne. This year he gives us a proof of the versatility of his talent in the rapid and brilliant execution of these small pictures, so full of life and movement.—En Batterie (774), by M. Detaille, is one of the most interesting works in the Salon. A battery of the Artillerie de la Garde under the Second Empire is seen driving through a cloud of dust and smoke, and arriving at full gallop before the spectator. The officer in command, slightly turned in his saddle to give a rapid order to those behind him, gives a superb movement to his magnificent black horse, reeking with foam. Both man and horse are almost life size, and are full of intense life; the drawing is firm and precise without dryness or hardness. It is a fine equestrian portrait, of a truly magnificent gait and undoubted power.

In Rêve d'Été (1356) M. Franc Lamy has painted a sort of idyl in which he has attempted to modernize mythology. Some nymphs are seen lying on the grass in a meadow gay with flowers. The foliage of the trees intercepts the full sunlight, and makes alternate flecks of light and shadow on the nude bodies. This picture is a curious mixture of realistic tendencies and classical reminiscences.

On the other hand, we are face to face with bare reality before the works of M. Moreau de Tours and M. Bisson. Both painters have gone to the hospitals for their subjects and models. The first shows us Les Fascinés de la Charité (1734). The second has grouped a number of doctors and surgeons around the bed of a patient who has just undergone an operation—Après l'Opération (230). This picture contains two or three fairly good portraits.

FERDINAND DUVAL.

SALES.

MESSRS. CHRISTIE, MANSON & WOODS sold on the 10th and 12th inst. the following, from the Wells Collection. Pictures: C. Brooking, A Calm, with vessels, boats, and figures, 199l. Sir A. W. Callcott, A View in Holland, with market, 294l.; An Italian Lake Scene, with a monk and three other figures, 178l. E. W. Cooke, Rouge et Noir, 110l. W. Collins, Hop-pickers, 357l. T. Creswick, At Killarney, 210l. W. Etty, A Bacchante, 446l. T. Gainsborough, A Woody Landscape, with three cows on the bank of a stream, 378l. F. Goodall, A Halt at a Well, Brittany, 141l. A. Kauffman, The Shepherdess, 220l. Sir F. Grant, Portrait of Sir Edwin Landseer, the dog by Sir E. Landseer, 126l. Sir E. Landseer, Dead Pheasant, 367l.; Death of the Woodcock, 672l.; Heads of Sheep and Cattle, 598l.; Roe's Head and Ptarmigan, 420l.; Trim, "the old dog looks like a picture," 787l.; A Highland Interior, 2,415l.; Grouse, 1,113l.; Ptarmigan, 630l.; Pointer, 892l.; Black Cock and Grey Hen, 1,260l.; Teal and Woodcock, 1,207l.; Partridges, 1,470l.; Dead Wild Duck, 577l.; Black Highland Ox, 346l.; The Reaper, 420l.; The Shepherd's Grave, 1,260l.; The Woodcutter, 2,310l.; The Hawk and The Peregrine Falcon, 1,000l.; The Honeymoon, 4,042l.; Deerhound and Mastiff, 1,470l.; None but the Brave deserve the Fair, 4,620l.; Hare and Stout, 640l.; Dairymaid, 661l.; Otter and Salmon, 1,365l.; Not Caught Yet, 3,150l.; A Terrier and Dead Wild Ducks, 2,730l.; Spaniel and Pheasant, 1,575l.; Retriever and Woodcock, 2,205l.; Browning, Stag and Hinds feeding, with portraits of Sir E. Landseer and Mr. W. Wells, 2,100l. F. R. Lee and Sir E. Landseer, A Wood Scene, with fallow deer, 420l. G. Morland, Ferreting Rabbits, 472l. W. Müller, Rock Temples, 262l. W. Mulready, A Dog of Two Minds, 1,218l. Sir J. Reynolds, Meditation, the Hon. Mrs. Spencer, 1,155l.; Edwin, 315l. D. Roberts, Malines, 105l. C. Stanfield, Near Sepolina, Lago di Como, 1,113l. J. M. W. Turner, Sheerness, with the sun rising through a fog, 7,455l. T. Webster, The Smile and The Frown, 1,207l.; A Modern Diogenes, 178l. F. Wheatley, The Fisherman's Departure and The Fisherman's Return, 152l. Sir D. Wilkie, Distraining for Rent, 2,310l.; The Jew's Harp, 446l.; The Village Festival, 1,890l. R. Wilson, An Italian Lake Scene, with a castle on a rocky height, 210l. N. Berchem, Peasants milking Kine, 178l.; The Ford, 892l. M. Hobbema, A View in Westphalia, 2,835l.; A Woody Landscape, with a peasant and dogs on a road in front, 262l. Rembrandt, A Young Lady, styled 'The Artist's Wife,' 1,690l. Jacob Ruysdael, A Forest Scene, 997l.; The Ruins of a Fort, 367l. D. Teniers, The Interior of a Kitchen, 252l. A. Van de Velde, A Meadow, in which are three cows and two goats, 987l. W. Van de Velde, A Sea View, 1,207l. P. Wouvermans, A View on the Coast, 378l. Murillo, Head of a Bacchante, 1,365l.; St. Mary Magdalen, 357l. Drawings: D. Roberts, The Entrance to Madrid, 52l. J. M. W. Turner, View of Westminster, from Paper Buildings, Temple, 54l.; Pilgrims at the Sacred Fair of Hurdwar, 52l. F. R. Lee, Leverets and Frog, 210l.

The same auctioneers sold on the 13th inst. the following engravings after Sir Joshua Reynolds, from the collection formed by the second Viscount Palmerston: Lady Sarah Bunbury, whole length, by E. Fisher, 52l. Miss Campbell, three-quarters length, by V. Green, 63l. Miss Frances Cholmondeley (afterwards Mrs. Bellingham), crossing a brook, carrying a dog, whole length, by J. Marchi, 42l. Countess of Coventry, three-quarters length, by J. Watson, 43l. Miss Emma and Miss Elizabeth Crewe, three-quarters length, by J. Dixon, 58l. Lady Elizabeth Herbert and Son, whole length, by J. Dean, 44l. Lady Harriet Herbert, three-quarters length, by V. Green, 118l. Lady Caroline Howard, whole length, by V. Green, 60l. Miss Jacobs, three-quarters length, by J. Spilsbury, 58l. Duchess of Manchester and her Son George, Viscount Mandeville, whole length, as Diana and Cupid, by J. Watson, 67l. Miss Meyer, whole length, as Hebe, by J. Jacobé, 52l. Hon. Miss Monckton, full length, by J. Jacobé, 69l. Mrs. Musters, whole length, by J. R. Smith, 189l. Miss Nelly O'Brien, nearly whole length, by C. Phillips, 54l. Mrs. Pelham, Feeding Chickens, whole length, by W. Dickinson, 120l. Duchess of Rutland, whole length, by V. Green, 40l. Lady Charles Spencer, three-quarters length, by W. Dickinson, 79l. Mrs. Taylor (afterwards Lady), three-quarters length, by W. Dickinson, 54l.

Fine-Art Gossip.

THE election of Mr. H. Herkomer to the vacant Royal Academician ship was fully anticipated. Mr. Herkomer was chosen an Associate in 1879, since when Sir E. Boehm and Messrs. Barlow, Burgess, Cole, Fildes, Graham, Holl, Long, Oulless, Pearson, Riviere, Stone, and A. Waterhouse have been promoted to the higher grade of the Academy, and Messrs. Le Jeune, Nicoll, and Woodington have retired from the Associateship.

MR. POYNTER's large picture of the 'Queen of Sheba's Visit to Solomon,' which we have already described at length, is now at Mr. McLean's, in the Haymarket. The private view is appointed for to-day (Saturday); the public will be admitted on Monday next.

IN Room X. of the National Gallery has been placed a cabinet picture comprising portraits of a man and his wife and their child; on the ground is a basket of grapes. The man is standing; the wife is sitting. The background is a wooded landscape. On our left flows a slow and placid river, a village stands on its right bank, and in the distance is a large town. The whole, and particularly the drapery, is painted with very great care, the chequer pattern worked in the black satin and velvet dresses being exhaustively treated. The heads remind us of Terburg's school. The landscape is in a monochrome of brown, and subordinated to the black of the dresses. The picture is signed on the left, "C. [or G.] Donck." If it be by G. van Donck, the picture is a specimen of a rare hand, three of whose works are Nos. 565, 1447, and 1450 in the Liechtenstein Gallery at Vienna. The first is a camp scene; the latter two are portraits of an old man and an old woman, signed G. van Donck, and dated 1627. In the same room have been hung the following pictures, removed from other parts of the gallery: No. 107, 'Landscape,' by G. van Goyen; 203, 'Conventual Charity,' by G. van Harp; and 208, 'The Finding of Moses,' by B. Breenberg. To their places in Room XI. have been restored eight examples of the old German school, Nos. 250, 251, 253, 254, 255, 257, 262, and 265, and the 'Head of a dead Christ resting on the Cross,' all attributed to the Meister von Liesborn. In Room VI. have been replaced Nos. 646 and 647, examples of the Umbrian school of the fifteenth century.

As an addition to his noble gifts to the nation of portraits of eminent men of his time, Mr. Watts is making a copy of the likeness of Rossetti he produced in 1865, when the artist and poet was in his prime. The original now belongs to Mr. F. Leyland, and was No. 344 at the Royal Academy Winter Exhibition, 1883.

MR. DUNTHORNE exhibits Mr. G. Hitchcock's "Atmospheric Notes in Pastel," from and after to-day, Saturday. The Fine-Art Society exhibit until June 7th a collection of sketches of Egypt, Algiers, and Tunis, by Mr. E. George.

MESSRS. DOWDENSELL exhibit Col. H. B. Hanna's collection of Indian and Persian pictures and manuscripts, principally of the fifteenth, sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries, and by native artists.

MESSRS. A. TOOTH & SONS exhibit in the Haymarket a new, large, and very fine drawing by Mlle. R. Bonheur, which is called 'Scotch Sires,' a group of bulls standing on a stony moor, among heather and weather-beaten rocks. The artist's skill is patent in every touch of this capital work not less than her fine feeling for the expressions and characters of her subjects.

AT Niagara in London, York Street, Westminster, Mr. C. A. de l'Aubinière exhibits "Sixty Pictures in Black and White (oils) representing American Scenery."

As the committee of the Society of Medallists made no award of prizes in April, another competition will take place in October next, when prizes of 20l. and 5l. will be offered for medals in metal or models of medals in plaster. Objects in competition should be sent to the honorary secretary, Mr. H. A. Grueber, British Museum, by October 1st.

DR. SCHLIEHMANN has found up to the present date in the Troad only a few ornamental fragments of the Hellenic period, and some small fragments of inscriptions.

THE Athenian Archæological Society has excavated the thalos of Amyclæ, near Sparta. The many objects of gold, &c., in the style of Mycenæ, and the numerous fibulæ of the Italic Suessola type, now found, will probably modify the current theory about the Mycenaean epoch, and bring it down to near the end of the sixth century B.C.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.—Philharmonic Concerts. M. Paderewski's Pianoforte Recital. The Richter Concerts. THEATRE ROYAL, CAMBRIDGE.—Gluck's 'Orpheus and Eurydice.'

WE have had occasion to remark upon the latitude which the directors of the Philharmonic Society have recently permitted themselves in the selection of works considered suitable for their concerts, and the introduction of Signor Mancinelli's suite 'Scène Veneziani' at the concert of Thursday last week requires a further word of protest. Objection need not be taken to the freedom from all classical rules exhibited in the construction of the work; defiance of precedent may be justified by the beauty and general merit of the result. But in order to comprehend this suite it is necessary to pay attention to the vulgar story of an elopement and its sequel, which it professes to illustrate. Produced at promenade concerts the work would be passed over with contemptuous indifference, but being admitted to a place in a Philharmonic programme it demands more serious consideration than is warranted by its intrinsic value. The suite was composed two years ago, and was first performed by the Concert Society in Madrid. The first of the five movements mainly represents Carnival revels, one theme, we are told, representing Punchinello; another, flowing and expressive, indicates the first meeting of a youthful pair, and may be called the love motive. The second movement is virtually a scène d'amour, and may be described as a duet for oboe and corno inglese. The next section suggests the flight, and answers to the scherzo in a symphonic work. It is virtually a moto perpetuum, and is very bright and animated. The fourth, labelled "Return in a Gondola," is a kind of freely written barcarolle; and the fifth, "Wedding Ceremony and Dance," may be said to describe itself. In its general character and in the rich orchestration the work is vehement, warm, and voluptuous. As interpreted by the magnificent Philharmonic orchestra it could not fail to prove effective under the composer's vigorous direction. A far more legitimate success, however, was won by the young pianist Mr. Leonard Borwick, who, as pupil of Madame Schumann, has developed his natural gifts in a right direction. Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto was, of course, a wise selection under the circumstances, and a glance at the platform was necessary to convince the listener that the composer's widow was not at the key-board. Mr. Borwick's performance, however, was something more than a mechanical imitation, and we shall be surprised if he does not prove to be an artist as well as an exceptionally clever pupil. His rendering of pieces by Brahms and Rubinstein later in the programme served to confirm the favourable impression he had made in the concerto. The vocalist at this concert was Miss Macintyre, whose voice and method were displayed to advantage in the aria "O peaceful night," from Mr. Cowen's cantata 'St. John's Eve,' and Mozart's "Dove sono," but the young soprano still needs improvement in the matter of elocution. Stress may be laid on this point, as a very high position as a concert-room singer is within Miss Macintyre's grasp, should she take the trouble to overcome the imperfections which continue to mar her efforts. Beethoven's overture 'Leonora,' No. 3, and Liszt's Rhapsody, No. 4, completed the programme.

The Polish pianist M. Paderewski certainly succeeded in astonishing the small audience that assembled on the occasion of his first appearance in England on Friday last week, and if amateurs are still attracted by meretricious sensationalism in pianoforte playing his remaining recitals will be more largely attended. There was nothing remarkable in his programme. Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in E minor, Schumann's Fantasia in C, Op. 17, studies and pieces by Chopin, and trifles from his own pen made up the bulk of the scheme. M. Paderewski appears to imagine that effect in pianoforte playing is chiefly to be gained by violent contrasts. At times he pounded the instrument until music degenerated into mere noise; while at others he evinced a command of the pianissimo not exceeded by any living pianist. But almost everything he did was marred by exaggerations, which more or less obscured the composer's meaning. The worst to suffer in this respect was Schumann, whose beautiful and romantic fantasia was rendered in a style that made the music at times unrecognizable. The Polish executant has striking gifts; but he is certainly not a model pianist, and his playing gives as much pain as pleasure to listeners of refined tastes.

There is no sign whatever of weariness on the part of the public with the works of which the repertory of the Richter Concerts chiefly consists. The first of the new series last Monday was made up of wholly familiar material, yet the audience was exceptionally large. There is nothing whatever to say concerning Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, the preludes to 'Die Meistersinger' and 'Parsifal,' and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 3. As to the performance, Herr Richter's orchestra was never in better form. The rendering of both symphonies was superb; but perhaps the skill of the conductor was most fully evinced in the 'Meistersinger' prelude, so frequently injured by coarse or careless playing. Every point in this marvellously constructed mosaic was brought out with the utmost clearness, and the listener could not but feel that Wagner's intentions were being wholly realized.

The revival of Gluck's 'Orpheus and Eurydice' at Cambridge this week must be regarded as one of the most interesting events of the season, though its artistic success was not so great as could have been desired. A good deal of attention has been paid to Gluck's works at some of the continental musical centres recently, and some time since we gave currency to an official statement from Mr. Augustus Harris that 'Orpheus' would be revived at the Royal Italian Opera this season. Whether this promise will be fulfilled is at the present moment, we believe, a matter of doubt. A large portion of the work was performed at one of Mr. Ganz's concerts in 1881, but the last stage revival in London was as far back as 1860, when the principal parts were sustained by Mesdames Cziliag, Penco, Miolan-Carvalho, and Nantier-Didié. This was due to a remarkably successful performance in Paris in the preceding year, when Madame Viardot sustained the leading character. Musicians familiar with Gluck do not need to be reminded that the Leipzig score of the work, edited by Alfred Dörfel, is a compound of the original Italian version, produced in Vienna in 1762, and the revised edition prepared for Paris in 1774, the changes in which were due as much to the conditions of the Académie as to the development of the composer's revolutionary theories with respect to lyric drama. These theories were scarcely ripe at the time, or, at any rate, Gluck did not feel himself strong enough to resist certain inartistic additions to his score, such as the florid and valueless air composed by Bertoni, and inserted at the conclusion of the first act, and the chaconne danced by Gaetano Vestris, against which he raised an ineffective protest. It is scarcely necessary to state that the Cambridge version prepared by Prof. Villiers Stanford did not include either of these numbers; and another artistic reform was the restoration of the principal rôle to the contralto voice, for which it was originally intended, though for obvious reasons it must now be assigned to a female performer. With respect to the orchestration, we are disposed to think that Prof. Stanford has some authority for his use of the trombones, and other elaborations on the original score; and even if it were not so it would be pedantic to condemn without examination any additions to a work which, if performed precisely as the composer left it, would certainly sound strange and ineffective to modern ears. In matters of this kind every alteration of a score written in the style of a bygone age must stand on its own merits, but as a matter of artistic conscientiousness changes of any kind should be clearly indicated in the programme of the performance, and the reasons for such changes fully set forth.

To return to 'Orpheus': although the archaic forms used by the composer prevent us from regarding his music as dramatic in the full sense of the term, yet within the shackles imposed upon him by the style of the period Gluck moves with extraordinary freedom, grace, and power. The choruses of the furies at the beginning of the second act, and the gradual subjugation of the infernal deities by the spell of Orpheus's lyre, are singularly fine and graphic; and the classic calm and beauty of the music descriptive of the placid existence in the Elysian Fields are not less picturesque and felicitous in idea and treatment. The first act is the weakest of the three, but there are some powerful dramatic touches in the duet between the lovers at the commencement of the third, and the merits of the beautiful air "Che farò" are too well known to need description. How much Mozart was indebted to Gluck can scarcely be estimated, but the younger master was far superior to the elder not only as a melodist, but as a contrapuntist, and in this age of revived interest in contrapuntal writing it is quite possible that Gluck's poverty in this respect would prove a bar to the full appreciation of his works.

We have said that the performance of 'Orpheus and Eurydice' at the Cambridge theatre was not so satisfactory as there was reason to expect. Being an amateur, Mrs. Alfred Bovill may in one sense be regarded as exempt from criticism, but her appearance in the leading part was distinctly unwise. She was for the most part unable to render justice to the music, and the majority of the audience previously unacquainted with it were necessarily unable to form an accurate estimate of its beauty. Mrs. Hutchinson is an excellent vocalist, but she seemed ill at ease on the stage, and her Eurydice was far from satisfactory.

Miss Margaret Davies, who took the part of Eros, is a scholar at the Royal College of Music. She showed promise, and on the whole was the most commendable of the three principal performers. The amateur chorus, at any rate on the first night, was rather feeble and unsteady; but the orchestra was satisfactory, and the mise en scène showed a good deal of artistic care, allowance, of course, being made for the small size of the stage. It should be added that the English version of the text was that of the late H. F. Chorley, considerably revised.

Musical Gossip.

THE number of interesting concerts during the past few days has been exceedingly large, and we regret the impossibility of noticing them as fully as they deserve. Last Saturday afternoon the Bach Choir concluded its season with a performance, in most respects highly commendable, of Brahms's 'Deutsches Requiem' and Prof. Stanford's 'Revenge.' Miss Fillunger and Mr. Ffrangcon Davies were the principal vocalists, the young baritone further advancing his position by his very expressive singing. Next season the number of concerts will be increased to four, and the public is invited to assist in the development of the enterprise either by subscription or guarantee.

AFTER an absence of many years Madame Teresa Carreno reappeared as a pianist at the Princes' Hall last Saturday afternoon, and displayed striking ability as an interpreter of Liszt. She was also heard to much advantage in the first and last movements of Beethoven's 'Sonata Appassionata.' Madame Carreno is a most powerful executant, and she deserves greater recognition as an artist than when she was last in London. More than this cannot be said at present.

THE Musical Guild announces another series of chamber concerts at the Kensington Town Hall on May 28th, and June 4th, 17th, and 24th. The programmes as arranged are excellent, but the young players will scarcely gain the attention they deserve until they choose a more central position for their performance.

AN excellent performance was given of Macfarren's operetta 'Jessy Lea' at the Kilburn Town Hall on Friday in last week. Miss Emily Armfield sang well in the titular part, but acted feebly, and the same remark will apply to Mr. T. W. Turner. Mr. Musgrave Tufnail was more vigorous, but the success of the performance was chiefly won by Miss Mary Willis as the gipsy. Her singing and acting were alike admirable, and she would certainly prove a valuable acquisition to the operatic stage.

MADAME ADELINA PATTI's appearance at the Albert Hall on Wednesday evening was not a success. The prima donna was obviously unwell and could not sing the first of the pieces set down for her. Mr. Sims Reeves also disappointed, but Madame Patey, M. Johannes Wolf, M. Hollmann, Mr. Iver McKay, and Signor Foli rendered useful service in the concert.

ON the same evening an interesting concert was given by Mr. Ernest Kiver at the Princes' Hall. The programme included Grieg's Sonata in G, Op. 13, for piano and violin; Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's early Pianoforte Quartet in E flat; and five numbers of a new set of seven 'Spring Songs,' also from the pen of the Scottish composer. They are very musicianly and effective, perhaps the best being one entitled 'Summer at Last.' Miss Marguerite Hall rendered them ample justice, and praise must also be given to Mr. Kiver for his excellent pianoforte playing, and to Mr. Carrodus for his performance of Bach's 'Chaconne.'

THE concerts of the Royal Artillery band at St. James's Hall on Tuesday, the Kensington

Symphony Society on Friday last week at the Kensington Town Hall, Miss Isabella Thorpe-Davies's at the Steinway Hall on Wednesday, and several others, must pass without criticism.

CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK.

MON.	Mr. Aguilera's Concert, 3 St. James's Hall.
—	Miss Levinsohn's Pupils' Concert, 330, Steinway Hall.
—	Mr. F. G. Osbourne's Concert, 8, Addison Hall.
—	Nichter Concert, 8, 30, St. James's Hall.
—	Miss Anna Slesner's Concert, 8, 30, Steinway Hall.
—	Royal Italian Opera, 'Faust.'
TUES.	Miss Hilda Wilson's Vocal Recital, 3, Steinway Hall.
—	M. Paderewski's Pianoforte Recital, 3, St. James's Hall.
—	Signorina Gambogi's Matinée Musicale, 330, No. 10, Harley Street.
—	Miss Jessie White's Concert, 8, Steinway Hall.
—	Post-Rice Concert, 8, St. James's Hall.
—	Herr Hermann Heydrich's Concert, 8, 30, Princes' Hall.
—	Royal Italian Opera, 'Carmen.'
WED.	Mr. Arthur Fritschel's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Steinway Hall.
—	Harrow Music School Concert, 8, Steinway Hall.
—	Mr. E. E. Halfpenny's Annual Concert, 8, Athenæum, Camden Road.
THURS.	Madame Carreno's Pianoforte Recital, 3, St. James's Hall.
—	Mr. Lawrence Kellie's Vocal Recital, 330, Steinway Hall.
—	Philharmonic Concert, 8, St. James's Hall.
—	Royal Italian Opera, 'Les Fêcheurs des Perles.'
—	Mr. Alfred Greenwood's Concert, 8, Kensington Town Hall.
FRI.	Mr. Richard Blarrove's Concert, 3, Steinway Hall.
—	Royal Artillery Band Concert, 3, St. James's Hall.
—	Mr. Max Heinrich and Mr. Schenberger's Second Vocal and Piano Recital, 8, 30, Steinway Hall.
—	Royal Italian Opera, 'Lohengrin.'
SAT.	Miscellaneous Concert, 8, 30, Kensington Town Hall.
—	Royal Italian Opera.

DRAMA

THE WEEK.

DRURY LANE.—'Paul Kauvar,' a Drama in Four Acts. By Steele Mackaye.

CRITERION.—'She Stoops to Conquer.' Played in Three Acts.

'PAUL KAUVAR' is declared to be "the most successful drama ever produced in the United States of America, where it has been running continuously to crowded houses for the last four years." As is the case with many American novelties, histrionic, gastronomic, and other, it does not seem to have stood the ordeal of a voyage across the Atlantic. 'Paul Kauvar' was, indeed, received with favour by an audience crowding Drury Lane in every part last Monday. It is, however, conventional, extravagant, and uninteresting, and the representation is painfully inadequate, and it is to be hoped that the management has a piece in reserve that may take its place if, as is to be feared, it soon palls upon the London public. In the entire action is nothing dramatic, interesting, or conceivable. The acting, moreover, is distressingly bad, Mr. Terriss and Miss Millward, who play respectively the hero and heroine, showing complete incapacity to fill the stage of so large a theatre. In other characters the acting was farcical. Mr. Henry Neville and Mr. Arthur Stirling alone seemed capable of giving vitality to the characters assigned them.

If to produce laughter be the only end of comedy, Goldsmith's masterpiece can never have been properly treated until now, when it comes, to quote from Daniel's 'Musophilus,' "refin'd [!] with th' accents that are ours." By dint of additions and omissions Mr. Wyndham has succeeded in converting the piece into a farcical comedy of approved character and dimensions, through which he and his company rattle briskly in a couple of hours. He himself is the gayest and most volatile of Young Marlows, and Mr. Blakeley is the most waggish of Mr. Hardcastle. Mr. Giddens is a humorous Tony Lumpkin, Miss Mary Moore a winsome Miss Hardcastle, and Miss M. A. Victor a droll Mrs. Hardcastle. These separate impersonations are received with delight, and the whole goes amidst shouts and convulsions of laughter. With the exception of Tony Lumpkin, however, the characters are not Goldsmith's. Young Marlow only simulates bashfulness in his interview with Miss Hardcastle. His tongue must be in his cheek when he is pretending shyness. A man of the world, brisk, full of resources, up to every move in the game of life, he ashamed before a pretty chit of a girl! The notion is not to be entertained. Mr. Blakeley meanwhile is wholly out of place as Hardcastle. He should play Diggory. His comic by-play would be invaluable in that character, but in the friend of Sir Charles Marlow it is out of place. Sir Charles Marlow mean time all but disappears.

Dramatic Gossip.

THE 'Chronicle History of the London Stage, 1559-1642,' by Mr. F. G. Fleay, an edition of which, limited to 460 copies, will be published shortly by Messrs. Reeves & Turner, is intended to form a supplement to the works of Malone, Genest, and other writers. It is said to embody much curious and interesting information concerning our early theatres and actors.

It is to be hoped that the illness of Madame Sarah Bernhardt, which has delayed her country tour, will yield before June 16th, the day of her promised reappearance in London. It is said to be inflammation of the lymphatic vessels of the legs, a complaint the gravity of which it must be left to scientific opinion to determine. A speedy resumption of performances is, however, it is said, not to be expected. The habit of constantly kneeling in 'Jeanne d'Arc' is said to be responsible for the attack.

We are glad to hear that the arrangements are now completed for the production of Mrs. Augusta Webster's poetical drama 'In a Day' at Terry's Theatre, on the afternoon of the 30th inst. Miss Webster, the daughter of the author, is to make her début on the London stage in the character of Clydona, the heroine of the play; Myron, the hero, will be acted by Mr. Matthew Brodie; Olymnius, a Stoic slave, by Mr. Phillips, of Mr. Benson's company; and Euphranor by Mr. Acton Bond. The musical setting of the incidental songs has been entrusted to Miss Mary Carmichael. Prof. Warr has lent some of the classical scenery and properties designed by Mr. Walter Crane for his 'Story of Orestes.' Mr. Merridew (Mr. Benson's stage manager) is superintending.

'A MODERN MARRIAGE,' a four-act play by Mr. Neville Doone, has been produced at the Comedy Theatre at an afternoon performance. It is a conventional melodrama written with some care, and has one or two showy situations. It is open to the charge, however, of obtaining a fourth and superfluous act by the introduction of a new interest when the piece is virtually over. Miss Alma Murray played in very earnest and convincing style as the heroine; and Mr. Lewis Waller, Mr. Royce Carleton, and other actors were concerned in a generally competent interpretation.

A DRAMA by Mr. Carton is in contemplation at Terry's Theatre.

NEXT WEEK'S NOVELTIES AND REVIVALS.

TUES.	Toole's (Afternoon), 'My Mother,' by Miss Amy Steinberg.
WED.	Adelphi (Afternoon), 'The Bride of Love,' by Robert Buchanan.
—	Avenue (Afternoon), 'The Will and the Way,' Duologue by Justin H. McCarthy; revival of 'The Grandeur.'
—	Shaftesbury (Evening), 'Judah,' by Henry Arthur Jones.
THURS.	Haymarket (Afternoon), 'Sugar and Cream,' by J. P. Hurst; 'A River-side Story,' by Marie Bancroft; and 'The Up Train,' adaptation by C. Colnaghi.

[These announcements are subject to changes of plan on the part of managers.]

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—A. H.—C. E. L.—C. A. de L. A.—C. H.—received.
No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION BY POST.

	s.	d.
For Twelve Months	15	3
For Six Months	7	8

SATURDAY, MAY 24, 1890.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
M. RENAN'S YOUTHFUL ESSAY	665
PALESTINE UNDER THE MOSLEMS	665
BODENSTEDT'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY	667
BOOKS ON AFRICA	668
THE RECORDS OF NOTTINGHAM	669
NOVELS OF THE WEEK	669
CLASSICAL TRANSLATIONS	670
OUR LIBRARY TABLE—LIST OF NEW BOOKS ...	671-672
TWO VISIONS AT SEA; THE NINTH INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF ORIENTALISTS; THACKERAYANA; LORD LOVAT; SALES; 'THE NEEDY KNIFE-GRINDER'; MR. GEORGE HOOPER	673-674
LITERARY GOSSIP	674
SCIENCE—RECENT PUBLICATIONS; SOCIETIES; MEETINGS; GOSSIP	676-677
FINE ARTS—THE ROYAL ACADEMY; GOSSIP ...	677-681
MUSIC—THE WEEK; GOSSIP; CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK	682-683
DRAMA—THE WEEK; GOSSIP; NEXT WEEK'S NOVELTIES	683-684

LITERATURE

L'Avenir de la Science. Par Ernest Renan. (Paris, Calmann Lévy.)

M. RENAN'S preface renders the task of the critic difficult, if not altogether superfluous. Looking back across a period of nearly fifty years at this first expression of his former self, he coolly analyzes its defects both of style and of conception, and estimates the extent to which its ardent predictions have been either contradicted or confirmed by present reality. It would seem, indeed, as if the publication of a book like the present might well have been delayed until death should have "rounded" into completeness the life's work of the author, for it is then that the traces of effort put forth tentatively in this direction or in that acquire their real value, as disclosing the process, which mature art conceals, of the conception and building up of that which we should otherwise only have known as a finished product. But M. Renan has at last determined not to leave his early essay to be made known in a posthumous edition, but to give it to the world himself:—

"Ma vie se prolongeant au delà de ce que j'avais toujours supposé, je me suis décidé, en ces derniers temps, à me faire moi-même mon propre éditeur. J'ai pensé que quelques personnes liraient, non sans profit, ces pages resuscitées, et surtout que la jeunesse, un peu incertaine de sa voie, verrait avec plaisir comment un jeune homme, très franc et très sincère, pensait seul avec lui-même il y a quarante ans. Les jeunes aiment les ouvrages des jeunes. Dans mes écrits destinés aux gens du monde, j'ai dû faire beaucoup de sacrifices à ce qu'on appelle en France le goût. Ici, l'on trouvera, sans aucun dégoûtissement, le petit Breton consciencieux qui, un jour, s'enfuit épouvanté de Saint-Sulpice, parce qu'il crut s'apercevoir qu'une partie de ce que ses maîtres lui avaient dit n'était peut-être pas tout à fait vrai."

In 1848 M. Renan, as he now realizes and confesses, was a dreamer of dreams. First there was the dream that the scientific spirit, once disengaged from the fetters imposed upon it by the unholy alliance of ignorance and superstition, would move rapidly and unerringly to the final solution of the social problems which oppress and perplex humanity:—

"Tout en continuant de croire que la science seule peut améliorer la malheureuse situation de l'homme ici-bas, je ne crois plus la solution du problème aussi près de nous que je le croyais alors. L'indégalité est écrite dans la nature; elle est la conséquence de la liberté; or la liberté de l'individu est un postulat nécessaire du progrès humain."

In the second place M. Renan, disabused, as so many have been, by knowledge and experience, finds his youthful optimism exaggerated. Not that on that account he can only find safety in retreat to the opposite pole. There is here no hysterical recantation—no breaking in pieces, in the style of 'Locksley Hall Sixty Years After,' of an idol discovered to be only brass after all:—

"L'erreur dont ces vieilles pages sont imprégnées, c'est un optimisme exagéré, qui ne sait pas voir que le mal vit encore et qu'il faut payer cher, c'est-à-dire en privilèges, le pouvoir qui nous protège contre le mal."

And he goes on to indicate another error, the seeds of which he explains as a deposit of Catholic training, though similar flowers of fancy are to be noticed in our own time and country sprouting from what are presumably quite different germs:—

"On y trouve également enraciné un vieux reste de catholicisme, l'idée qu'on reverra des âges de foi, où régnera une religion obligatoire et universelle, comme cela eut lieu dans la première moitié du moyen âge. Dieu nous garde d'une telle manière d'être sauvés! L'unité de croyance, c'est-à-dire le fanatisme, ne renaîtrait dans le monde qu'avec l'ignorance et la crédulité des anciens jours. Mieux vaut un peuple immoral qu'un peuple fanatique; car les masses immorales ne sont pas gênantes, tandis que les masses fanatiques abâtissent le monde, et un monde condamné à la bêtise n'a plus de raison pour que je m'y intéresse; j'aime autant le voir mourir."

But on the whole, and in spite of these reservations, M. Renan feels that the light which he saw was the true light. Progress since 1848 has in the main adopted the line of advance laid down by him. With regard to the conquering idea of evolution, M. Renan confesses that he was not naturalist enough to thread the labyrinth of nature with its aid. The true place of man in the scale of being he misconceived, while sharing Hegel's error of attributing too decidedly to humanity the central rôle in the universe. But in the matter of all products or functions of man, such as language, literature, society, he was a decided evolutionist. In the sphere of political and social science, however, the progress made has been slight, and the future, which seems big with the elements of disturbance, is as unreadable as ever:—

"Entre les deux objectifs de la politique, grandeur des nations, bien-être des individus, on choisit par intérêt ou par passion. Rien ne nous indique quelle est la volonté de la nature, ni le but de l'univers. Qui aura, dans des siècles, le plus servi l'humanité, du patriote, du libéral, du réactionnaire, du socialiste, du savant? Nul ne le sait, et pourtant il serait capital de le savoir, car ce qui est bon dans une des hypothèses est mauvais dans l'autre. La politique est comme un désert où l'on marche au hasard, vers le nord, vers le sud, car il faut marcher. Nul ne sait, dans l'ordre social, où est le bien. Ce qu'il y a de consolant, c'est qu'on arrive nécessairement quelque part."

The conclusion is reaffirmed distinctly after the lapse of so many years. Those who believe firmly in science, who live the life both of thought and of action in accordance with its teachings, have chosen the good part. It is true there are many who, threatened probably in their class or caste interests by the advance and spread of knowledge, cry out that the ancient beliefs are being discredited, and that in consequence worth and beauty must vanish from the world; who imagine that man will of necessity cease to behave himself as soon as ever he ceases to be duped. But in spite of these sinister predictions, impavidi progrediamur:—

"Continuons de jouir du don suprême qui nous a été départi, celui d'être et de contempler la réalité. La science restera toujours la satisfaction du plus haut désir de notre nature, la curiosité; elle fournira toujours à l'homme le seul moyen qu'il ait pour améliorer son sort. Elle préserve de l'erreur plutôt qu'elle ne donne la vérité; mais c'est déjà quelque chose d'être sûr de n'être pas dupe. L'homme formé selon ces disciplines vaut mieux en définitive que l'homme instinctif des âges de foi. Il est exempt d'erreurs où l'être inculte est fatalement entraîné. Il est plus éclairé, il commet moins de crimes, il est moins sublime et moins absurde. Cela, dirait-on, ne vaut pas le paradis que la science nous enlève. Qui sait d'abord si elle nous l'enlève? Et puis, après tout, on n'appauvrit personne en tirant de son portefeuille les mauvaises valeurs et les faux billets. Mieux vaut un peu de bonne science que beaucoup de mauvaise science. On se trompe moins en avouant qu'on ignore qu'en s'imaginant savoir beaucoup de choses qu'on ne sait pas."

On turning to the pages of the essay itself the reader will probably be perplexed to find and hold the main thread of argument or exposition running through such a mass of words. The illustrations drawn from history or literature, which here and there light up the path of impetuous thought, are of the highest interest, for they reveal the attitude of the youthful critic on the very borders of the rich field which he was to go in and possess. One fact stands out in high relief from these pages—the profound influence upon an ardent disciple of the master-mind of Burnouf. So much, indeed, do we hear about the Vedas, about the orthodox systems of Hindu philosophy, that we seem to be listening not to the future historian of Christianity, but to one who has deliberately and passionately chosen the career of an Indianist, while an occasional slip reveals to the curious eye the fact that in 1848 the erudition even of a Renan was in certain respects more copious than minute. Here and there may be found a passage recalling either in form or in sentiment the later craft of the master; but, in conclusion, we repeat that the interest of the essay is essentially biographical. It solves no problems, suggests no new thoughts; but it gives fresh fulness and preciseness to our idea of a great personality.

Palestine under the Moslems. By Guy Le Strange. (Palestine Exploration Fund.)

'PALESTINE UNDER THE MOSLEMS' is an important and interesting addition to the series of works relating to the Holy Land that is being published under the auspices of the Palestine Exploration Fund; and it is most appropriately dedicated to the popular novelist who for more than twenty years has acted as secretary to the Fund.

It has always been known that a mass of valuable information relating to Jerusalem and Palestine lay buried in the Arabic texts of the Moslem geographers and travellers of the Middle Ages. But though several of the texts have been translated, either in whole or in part, into Latin, French, or German, there has hardly been an attempt to render their contents available to the English reader. The late Prof. Palmer, it is true, translated the more important texts relating to the origin and history of that most mysterious and beautiful of buildings, the "Dome of the Rock" at Jerusalem; but something more was wanted, and that has now been supplied. Mr. Le Strange is, we believe, the first Orientalist who has undertaken the highly laborious and difficult task of translating, comparing, and arranging in chronological order all the various accounts given by the Arab geographers of the cities, holy places, and districts of Palestine and Syria. He is one of the few Englishmen who combine the literary skill, knowledge of Arabic, and personal acquaintance with the localities described that such an undertaking requires, and who possess the patience and perseverance necessary to carry it to a successful conclusion. The result of Mr. Le Strange's four years' labour will be of great value to all students of the geography of Palestine who do not read Arabic, and we only regret that he did not adopt a different arrangement for the contents of his book. There are no doubt certain advantages in grouping under one heading extracts from various authors which relate to the same place; but separate translations of the different works, such as those which Prof. Gildemeister has contributed to the Zeitschrift des Deutschen Palaestina-Vereins, with critical notes and a good index, would, we think, have been more satisfactory.

In a brief introduction Mr. Le Strange supplies a list, with short biographical notices, of the twenty-four Arab geographers and historians from whose works he quotes. The earliest wrote in A.D. 864, the latest in 1496; and twelve of them lived and died before the Crusades had introduced new conditions of life, and effaced several of the old landmarks. Some of the writers combine great powers of observation with a profound knowledge of books and men, and their remarks on the physical features of the country and on the manners and customs of the people are of considerable interest. Mukaddasi of Jerusalem, for instance, who wrote in A.D. 985, gives a vivid description of his native country, and grows eloquent over its climate, its fruits, and its varied products. It is a "land of blessing," and "a country of cheapness, abounding in fruits"; and within its borders were to be "found gathered together six-and-thirty products that are not found thus united in any other land." From Jerusalem came cheeses, cotton, the celebrated 'Ainûni and Dûri raisins, apples, bananas, pine nuts, mirrors, lamps, needles, and the best of honey; from Jericho—indigo, and that "pearl of condiments" the Muri sauce; from 'Ammân—grain, lambs, and honey; from Tiberias—carpets, cloth, and the cotton-paper known as Bombycina; from Damascus—olive oil fresh pressed, cloth, brocade, oil of violets, brass vessels, paper, nuts, dried figs, and raisins; and so the long list continues for other districts.

The people of Palestine were well clad and prosperous. The chief shopkeepers rode "Egyptian asses, with fine saddles"; the Amirs and chiefs kept horses. The assayers, dyers, bankers, and tanners were Jews; the physicians and scribes were Christians; the Moslems looked down upon study, and were seldom known to be the propounders of new doctrines. All along the coast line were "watch-stations," to which Greek ships came laden with Moslem captives for ransom. "At the Stations," writes Mukaddasi,

"whenever a Greek vessel appears, they sound the horns; also if it be night, they light a beacon there on the tower; or, if it be day, they make a great smoke. From every Watch-station on the coast up to the capital (ar-Ramleh) there are built, at intervals, high towers, in each of which is stationed a company of men. On the occasion of the arrival of the Greek ships the men, perceiving these, kindle the beacon on the tower nearest to the coast-station, and then on that lying next above it, and onwards, one after another, so that hardly is an hour elapsed before the trumpets are sounding in the capital, and drums are beating in the towers, calling the people down to the Watch-station by the sea. And they hurry out in force, with their arms, and the young men of the village gather together. Then the ransoming begins. Some will be able to ransom a prisoner, while others (less rich) will throw down silver Dirhams, or signet rings, or contribute some other valuable, until at length all the prisoners who are in the Greek ships have been ransomed."

The whole country was divided by the Moslems at the time of the conquest into "Junds" or military districts, which, roughly speaking, corresponded with the old Roman and Byzantine provinces, such as they are described in the Code of Theodosius. The capitals were, however, changed; that of Palestina Prima, rechristened Filastin, was moved from Caesarea to ar-Ramleh, and Tiberias replaced Scythopolis in Palestina Secunda. The Junds lasted, with some modifications, until the Crusaders founded the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem, with its dependent baronies and counties; and after the re-establishment of Moslem rule Syria and Palestine were divided into nine kingdoms.

The physical features of the country are, as a rule, more accurately described than in the later records of pilgrims from the West; and the remarks made on them are often of value. For instance, Yâkût tells us that the Jews of his day held Mount Gerizim in great respect as the place where Abraham was commanded to sacrifice Isaac; and the same writer states that the Nahr al-'Aujâ was also called Nahr Abi Futrus, which really means, as M. Clermont-Ganneau has pointed out, the "river of Antipatris," Antipatris being corrupted into Abi Futrus. Sometimes, however, there are quaint speculations, such as those of Dimashki, on the disappearance of the waters of the Dead Sea. "Some say," he writes,

"that its waters have an exit into a country afar off, whose lands they irrigate and fertilize, and here the waters may be drunk. This country, they report, lies at a distance of two months' journey. Others say that the soil all round the lake being extremely hot, and having beds of flaming sulphur beneath, there never cease to rise vapours, and these, causing the water to evaporate, keep it to a certain level. Others, again, say there is an exit through the earth, whereby its waters join those of the Red Sea; and others again affirm it has no bottom, but that there is a passage leading down to the Behemoth (who supports the earth). But Allah knows best the truth of all this!"

Perhaps the point of greatest interest in the texts relating to Jerusalem is the strong evidence which they afford that the south-west angle of the Haram area was pointed out to Omar as the site of the Jewish Temple. Omar, we are told, gave directions, after his capture of the city, for the erection of a mosque on the site of the Masjid al-Aksa (the further shrine, i.e., the Jewish Temple), to which, according to the Kurân (xvii. 1), the Prophet was transported by night from the Masjid al-Haram (the shrine at Makkah). Only thirty-three years later Arculphus saw, on the site of the Temple, just such a mosque as the Arab conquerors would have been likely to build; and Theophanes, writing at the close of the eighth century, states that Omar was taken "to what in former times had been the Temple built by Solomon," and that he straightway converted it "into an oratory for blasphemy and impiety." If, then, we can ascertain the position of Omar's mosque, we can at the same time establish the traditional site of the Temple in the early part of the seventh century. There can be no doubt that Omar's mosque lay to the south of the "Dome of the Rock"; and one writer distinctly states that it was built in "the fore (or southern) part of the Haram area, and to the western side thereof," or exactly in the position assigned to the Jewish Temple by the late Mr. Fergusson. It is interesting to note that the "Double Gate" in the south wall of the Haram area is called by all Arab writers, prior to the Crusades, the "Gate of Muhammad," or "of the Prophet"; and that according to modern tradition the mosque of Omar and the place where he prayed were within the walls of the Mosque al-Aksa. The Sakhrâh, to which the Temple legends were transferred, was not included in the Masjid al-Aksa until Abd al-Malik, from political motives, built his dome over it, and induced his subjects to circumambulate it in place of the Black Stone in the Ka'abah at Makkah. The extension of the Masjid to the north, so as to bring the "Dome of the Rock" into the centre of the Haram area, was the work of Abd al-Malik's son, the Khalif al-Walid. Whether Abd al-Malik really built the "Dome of the Rock," or only restored and beautified an old Christian church, must still remain an open question. It is, however, certain that Mr. Fergusson was entirely in the wrong in asserting that "no Muhammadan writer of any sort, anterior to the recovery of the city from the Christians by Saladin, ventures to assert that his countrymen built the Dome of the Rock." Ya'kûbi (A.D. 874) and others after him state that Abd al-Malik built a dome over the Sakhrâh; but al-Walid is also said to have built the great mosque at Damascus, which still bears marks of its Christian origin, and we should probably be not very wrong if we understood in either case rebuilt, or restored, for "constructed."

Prof. Robertson Smith has pointed out, in his article on the "Temple" in the Encyclopædia Britannica, that the identification of the Sakhrâh with the "stone of foundation," and the transference to it of the Temple legends, may be traced back to the Moslem Jew, Wahb ibn Monabbih, "who enriched Islam with so many Jewish legends, and died a century after Jerusalem was taken by the Arabs." It is much to be regretted that Mr. Le Strange has made no reference to this interesting subject, and that he has not attempted to trace the gradual growth of Jewish legends round the Sakhrāh. In some minor particulars Mr. Le Strange has been wrongly informed; for instance, "Herod's Gate" at Jerusalem, which he says rightly is called Bāb as-Sāhirah by old Arab writers, is certainly known at the present day as Bāb az-Zahriyeh, Gate of Splendour, and as Bāb az-Zahireh, Gate of Blooming. The plans and drawings that illustrate the chapters on Jerusalem are capable of improvement; they appear to have been taken from De Vogüé's great work and other sources. In one case a view, and not a good one, has been enlarged from an illustration in Baedeker's 'Guide to Palestine.' The elaborate plans and beautiful photographs of the Ordnance Survey of Jerusalem are completely ignored.

There is an excellent description of Damascus, with its fertile plain, and its great mosque, in which, if we are to believe Ibn Jubair, no spider spins his web, and on which no swallow ever alights. And this chapter is followed by quaint Moslem legends and by notices of all the principal towns in the country. Acre, Tyre, Sidon, Tiberias (with its hot springs), Nāblus, Ascalon, Gaza, and other places, are fully described; and under Hebron are given some of the records of visits to the sepulchres of the Patriarchs, which the late Comte Riant was the first to collect. A good index, in which nearly all the Arabic place-names are written in Arabic, adds much to the value of the book.

In conclusion, we would express the hope that Mr. Le Strange may complete the work that he has commenced by collecting the topographical notices in the works of the Arab historians. It was from one such notice that M. Clermont-Ganneau obtained the clue which led to his discovery of the site of Gezer; and it was in an Arab history that he found a contemporary record of the stoppage of the waters of Jordan for several hours, above Jisr Damieh, which was very similar to that which took place when "the waters which came down from above stood, and rose up in one heap, a great way off, at Adam, the city that is beside Zarethan; and those that went down toward the sea of the Arabah, even the Salt Sea, were wholly cut off; and the people passed over right against Jericho." These examples show that a study of the Arab histories may lead to interesting and unexpected discoveries.

Erinnerungen aus meinem Leben. Von Friedrich Bodenstedt. (Berlin, Allgemeiner Verein für Deutsche Literatur.)

THIS volume is not merely a chronicle of Bodenstedt's own life, but it is full of historical studies, bits of the folk-lore of Germany, Russia, and Persia, charming descriptions of life in Russia and Persia in the first half of the present century, and strange glimpses into the intrigues of Russian court life. In the earlier part of the work too much space is devoted to historical matter, and too little to the personal life of the writer; but as he passes on from his youthful days to his early manhood the interest of his autobiography increases.

A poet whose verses have attained to some 120 editions, and have been translated into thirteen tongues, including Hebrew, should be familiar to Englishmen; but Bodenstedt is little read here, and his songs as a whole still await a good English translator, though some specimens of them have been published in England, and in Hamburg an English version has appeared. In addition to his Eastern work it is as a translator and editor of Shakespeare that he is best known in Germany, and his acquaintance with English literature is wide and sound.

He was born at Peine in Hanover at a time when "Hanover ruled England, and not England Hanover; for the house of Hanover had given her her king," and when "he looks like an Englishman" was a high compliment in Peine and the surrounding district. Bodenstedt's father was a somewhat important personage in Peine, but austere towards his children: "Tenderness was to him womanly, especially kisses, so that I can never in my whole childhood remember receiving a kiss from him"; and he carried his severity so far as to throw the child into the water, if on a cold chilly morning he stood shivering on the grass instead of jumping in at once. This enforced bathing, however, wrung from the boy his first poem; for when nine years old, whilst bathing alone, he was carried out of his depth, but rescued by a farmer's son, and he commemorated his escape in a dozen lines of verse. From his mother he received the first poetical impressions that made him strive to imitate the old German songs which she sang to him in the twilight. His father, though he afterwards used every means to suppress the inclinations of his son, "as no poet had ever been known in Germany to live by his poetry," did unwittingly assist the imaginative yearnings of the boy by giving him a toy theatre—a gift that led to no less a dramatic representation than the 'Taking of Jerusalem by the Crusaders,' Jerusalem being first built in a neighbour's back garden with stones "borrowed" from the building of the new Rathaus in the market-place.

Up to the age of eight the boy was educated at the town school; but then the father combined with some other parents to hire a joint tutor to teach their sons the classics. Bodenstedt gives some amusing notices of the various tutors under whose guidance he studied Latin. Life in Germany, too, at that time, when the Poles were rising against Russia, Paris was in revolution, and the Greeks were throwing off the Turkish yoke, is vividly sketched. The influence these events had on the young lad's imagination was intensified when he beheld the glare from Brunswick in flames arise in the heavens. At sixteen, in spite of all suppression, Bodenstedt ventured upon a metrical translation of 'Macbeth,' "which did not turn out so badly," but the principal gain from which was that he committed to memory nearly the whole of the English text. This was probably the foundation of the marvellous memory which Bodenstedt at seventy years of age still possesses. As a brother poet said of him in his presence a short time since, "he remembers everything he writes," asking him at the same time to recite a political poem he had just written upon Katkoff and Boulanger of some hundred or more lines, and without hesitation Bodenstedt complied with the wish. Upon another occasion, whilst walking down a quiet street in Wiesbaden, where he now lives, he laid his hand upon the writer's shoulder and recited a long extract from Chatterton, and later on a part of an English ballad, to illustrate certain moods of English poetry.

His eyes were first turned towards Russia by an old Rittmeister who had served under Napoleon at Borodino, and in 1841 he obtained the position of tutor to the two sons, Michael and Dimitry, of Prince Michael Galitzin. The part of his memoirs which deals with his life in Russia is sometimes wearisome, from the long excursions into Russian history; but it affords glimpses into the old heathen life that still retains its hold on the people beneath a veneer of Christianity, and by some strange anecdotes proves how fully the aristocracy of Russia regarded the lower orders as cattle. He found German literature in but little favour in Russia; but Balzac's 'Peau de Chagrin,' the 'Pickwick Papers,' and 'Vanity Fair' were in every house. The pages upon folk rhymes, customs, and superstitions are full of interest. The persistency with which Bodenstedt seized upon every opportunity to perfect himself in modern languages is worthy of note. Whilst busy in his spare hours with translating Russian poetry, he spent his Sunday evenings with a Mr. Henry Frears and Mr. Thomas Shaw, the latter also being engaged in translating from the Russian, and, as Bodenstedt remarks, on something which paid better, viz., novels.

It was his love for Shakespeare which brought him in contact with the Governor-General of Moscow, Alexander v. Neidhart, whom he was afterwards again to meet as Governor of the Caucasus. The Princess Galitzin begged him to give the two younger daughters of General Neidhart lessons in Shakespeare, and the general sometimes joined in the readings. A yet more interesting personage afterwards entered the household of the princess in the character of a tutor for Russian history and literature—a man who had just returned from two years' travel at the expense of the Government in France, Belgium, England, and Germany. This fellow tutor was Michael N. Katkoff, whom nearly fifty years later Bodenstedt satirized, as we have mentioned, in a political poem. Katkoff's early ideas, his sudden conversion from a friend of the Poles into their bitterest enemy, and his cynicism and ambition are rapidly sketched, the whole being summarized in the words, "In his old age he has trodden underfoot the ideal of his youth."

Bodenstedt's first book appeared in the year 1843 under the title 'Kosloff, Pushkin, Lermontoff: a Selection of their Poems,' but so full of mistakes and so weak did the poet himself deem his work to be that, after vainly struggling to revise it, he called in the edition, although the book had been fairly received in Russia and Germany.

The opportunity which was to make him famous and give him his especial place in the world of letters came in the shape of a call to the Gymnasium at Tiflis. At Tiflis — "the starting-point of his activity as an author"—he soon met with men of influence. One of the ladies' favourites in that capital was Prince Dondoukoff - Khorsakoff, the present Governor-General of the Caucasus; another officer, who was "not to be met with at balls," was a youthful and retiring Lieut. Kauffmann, who even then yearned to conduct an army into the heart of Asia. Yet another personage destined afterwards to be famous in Russian history Bodenstedt met where he first heard a Persian singer excite the enthusiasm and ecstasy of his listeners, especially the Georgians and Armenians. This young officer of the Guards, who was sitting next to Bodenstedt, passed the wine, but became communicative. Sent at an early age to St. Petersburg and educated in the corps of Pages, Boris Melikoff had lost touch with the songs of his birthplace. An intimate friend of Bodenstedt's at this period, and one who took lessons with him from the Mirza Schaffy whose name Bodenstedt has made famous, was Dr. George Rosen, the well-known philologist, and with Rosen he made an excursion into Armenia and to Ararat. Dr. Rosen introduced Bodenstedt and his work to Cotta, the Stuttgart publisher, and the outcome was that he became a contributor to the Allgemeine Zeitung, and Cotta produced his work 'Die Poetische Ukraine.'

Bodenstedt heard of the recall of his friend General Neidhart from the government of the Caucasus before even the general knew of it himself. Count Woronzoff, who had been educated in England, was to take his place, and at a ball Bodenstedt met a young Englishman, a friend of the count's, who indirectly informed him of the change. This was Henry Danby Seymour, who was afterwards to be an intimate friend of Bodenstedt's and proved of great value to him when he stayed in England. "Rarely," writes the author, "have I known a man who so clearly laid down a plan in life as Seymour, without a moment's doubt as to its fulfilment." It was Seymour who, in 1859, introduced Bodenstedt to Lord John Russell, Sir A. Layard, and Sir H. Rawlinson, at the same period when the Prince Consort showed great friendliness towards him. The disgrace of General Neidhart and other incidents give an insight into the autocratic rule of the Czar, and one striking story is told of another general being reduced suddenly to a private soldier, the first intimation he received of his disgrace being the taunt, upon his entering a fortress, of some subordinate, that "he should be ashamed of himself to play the general when he was but a common soldier."

The charm of the volume increases as it draws near its conclusion. Bodenstedt quitted Tiflis, and in company with Seymour journeyed to the Black Sea. At Gori Seymour gave up the "martyrdom of the telega," and built a raft to take him back to Tiflis, leaving Bodenstedt to journey on alone. The adventures met with in getting down to the Black Sea and across to the Crimea are full of pleasant, even exciting incident; but at last Bodenstedt found himself on board a Russian war-ship, English built, and commanded by an English captain Martin. From the Crimea he made his way round to Trieste.

The whole work is crowded with careful studies and disquisitions. It is the very opposite to the "Recollections" that are at present so plentiful in England, containing as it does not only sketches of the writer's life and the people he met, but researches into the inner life of nations, their past history and present development, and yet there are dramatic and touching incidents that are full of pathos and passion. The author promises that this volume shall be followed by another.

BOOKS ON AFRICA.

Les Lacs de l'Afrique Équatoriale. Par Victor Giraud. (Hachette & Co.)

Reisebilder aus Liberia. Von J. Büttikofer. Vol. I. (Leyden, Brill.)

Calabar and its Mission. By Hugh Goldie. (Olyphant, Anderson & Ferrier.)

Sub Sole. By the Right Rev. A. Smith. (Nisbet.)

East Africa and its Big Game. By Capt. Sir John C. Willoughby, Bart. (Longmans & Co.)

Through Gasa Land, and the Scene of the Portuguese Aggression. By Parker Gilmore. (Harrison & Sons.)

THE results of Lieut. Giraud's remarkable journey to Lakes Nyassa, Tanganyika, and Bangweolo have long been before the world, but are now for the first time published in a collected form, as one of those lavishly illustrated volumes which we look forward to as a matter of right at the hands of Messrs. Hachette. Lieut. Giraud proves himself a good narrator. His narrative is eminently readable without, at the same time, snatching at a cheap popularity. It is quite refreshing, after having seen so many stones thrown at Protestants and British missionaries, even by their own countrymen, to listen to what a Frenchman has to say about the good work done by Scotchmen in the Nyassa region. The troubles between England and Portugal had not arisen when Lieut. Giraud wrote his book, and what he says about the Portuguese in that part of Africa may, therefore, be accepted as the result of observation on the part of an unbiassed witness. This result is by no means flattering to Portuguese vanity. If a fault is to be found with this book, it is the poverty of the maps and the omission of the scientific observations which Lieut. Giraud is known to have made.

It is a curious fact that our knowledge of no part of Africa should have made less progress in the course of the last fifty years than of the huge territory which represents on our maps the negro republic of Liberia. Of the far interior of that country we know absolutely nothing, except what has been told us in the barren narrative of Mr. Anderson's visits to Musardu, and unexplored regions extend close to the coast-line. A "Liberian bibliography" would no doubt enumerate quite an imposing list of books and pamphlets; but these, for the most part, deal with the origin and development of this settlement. Of the physical features of the country, its flora and fauna, we have but a very fragmentary knowledge. Dr. Büttikofer, one of the keepers of the Leyden Natural History Museum, therefore, has earned our gratitude for the voluminous information now publishing in his 'Reisebilder aus Liberia,' of which the first volume has recently been issued. Dr. Büttikofer paid two visits to Liberia, and devoted altogether thirty-three months to its exploration. Besides visiting every town, settlement, factory, and missionary station within its limits, he made at least one attempt to reach the interior, which took him through a belt of primeval forest to a region of grassy uplands. His principal object was the collection of zoological specimens, but finding himself in a country so little known, he was careful to collect notes also on the flora of the country and its geology, and to inform himself of the social condition of the inhabitants. His book, when completed, will thus form a much-needed monograph on one of the most interesting regions of Africa. His first volume contains a narrative of travel, a general description of the physical features of the country, and a chapter on its flora. In a second volume he promises to deal with the history of the settlement, with the inhabitants and the zoology. His work is amply furnished with maps and illustrations.

No person is probably better qualified to furnish an account of 'Calabar and its Mission' than the venerable Mr. Hugh Goldie, who has been engaged in missionary work there ever since 1848. It is only natural that the bulk of his volume should be devoted to the history of the mission, from its first inception, in 1846, down to the present day. Incidentally, however, and in separate chapters, he supplies a mass of information on the customs of the inhabitants, the religious notions of the people, and the system of government under which they live. Evidently he is a reasonable man, intimately acquainted with the people and their language, and what he has to say is, therefore, entitled to confidence. The mission has clearly not proved a success, if success be measured by the number of converts; but that it has borne fruit among so wild a people, demoralized by years of slave-trade, is equally apparent. The practice of sacrificing human beings on the grave of a great man has disappeared, vicarious punishments have been abolished, and twins, although they and their mothers are still objects of superstitious aversion, are allowed to live. Domestic slavery unfortunately survives, and it would hardly be prudent or productive of good to meddle rashly with it. The condition of these slaves is by no means so abject as some of our philanthropists suppose. "A slave, tending or cultivating land on his own account, may become a richer man and a greater slaveholder than his master, and practically as free." A few illustrations of the dreaded "Egbo-law" are given by the author, but he is evidently not an initiated member of this still mysterious brotherhood.

'Sub Sole' is a work of fiction, dedicated, by permission, to Lord Wolseley. The hero of the story meets the "Wandering Jew" in the Catacombs of Rome, and is supplied by him with the sinews of war for carrying on a missionary crusade in the heart of Africa. Electricity and all other resources of modern science are called into play. The curses of Africa are three, the author tells us—the Arab, the rum-seller, and the Jesuit!

Of Canon Taylor, described by him as the "champion of Islam," he says, spitefully, "If seven tailors make a man, seven Taylors would not make a theologian."

Opinions will differ somewhat as to the interest afforded by Sir John Willoughby's account of his sporting tour in East Africa. There are those who, if they can read of a rhinoceros and a buffalo being brought down with a right and left, will toil through a good deal that is less interesting; others will doubtless be wearied by such notes as, "I was now in rather a bad way, as all my boots were worn out, except one pair which fitted badly and blistered my heels." There is, in fact, from the literary point of view, a lack of the sense of proportion in his book. Many a man treads the streets of London in a pair of ill-made boots, but it is given to one only to make two such good shots as those of which the author is justly proud. Sir John, however, writes often with such an air of good spirits that many parts of his book are interesting reading. Going over land which has recently been visited by numerous scientific travellers, we do not get, nor can we expect, much novel information. With regard to the two best-known English explorers, we may say that the author has a great admiration for Mr. Thomson, and very much the opposite for Mr. Johnston; in fact, he has a hit at the latter whenever he gets the chance. As in all books of travel of this kind, the reader is told much of the trouble given by the attendants, some of whom seem to have been amusing; but the "mission men" were as great scoundrels as some people nearer home. Sir John's account of the "manufacture of missionaries" is instructive, but does not leave us with any greater respect for the process than he intended to convey. The book is well printed and beautifully illustrated. One of the plates shows the great zoological prize of the expedition—a bull rhinoceros with three horns.

As a record of sporting adventures 'Through Gasa Land' may prove acceptable to a large number of readers, but it fails altogether in giving trustworthy information on the geography of the regions which the author claims to have explored. Starting from Delagoa Bay, when he was a young man of twenty-five, in search of gold and ivory, the author crossed the Sabi river into Manica, which he found in the occupation of Mashona, who paid tribute to the Matabele king. He tells us, too, that "yearly the Matabele king despatches a formidable force to collect his rents" from the "poor, decrepit, pusillanimous Portuguese" at Pete and elsewhere on the Zambezi. All this is quite irreconcilable with what we have been told by St. Vincent Erskine and other trustworthy travellers. There is no allusion in this volume to Umzila, until quite lately the ruler of Gasa Land, although the author, to judge from his map, must have passed close to his residence; nor are the recent efforts of the Portuguese to extend their power to the south of the Zambezi alluded to. It is clear, therefore, that 'Through Gasa Land' must fail completely in supplying authoritative information on the present condition of the region with which it deals.

Records of the Borough of Nottingham. Vol. IV. 1547-1625. (Quaritch.)

THIS fourth, and as we are given to believe the last, volume of the 'Records of Nottingham,' if not so historically important as its forerunners, is in many ways far more amusing. It has been edited like its predecessors by Mr. W. H. Stevenson. His name does not occur on the title-page, but the fact is mentioned in the preface, which also tells us that Canon James Raine, of York, has revised the translations which are given of the Latin texts. The Latin is mostly law-Latin and by no means of an important character, except for those who are devoted to the history of the town. The latter part of the volume is made up of extracts from account-books in English. There is, perhaps, not much new knowledge to be gleaned, but they are interesting reading to those who care for the manners of past times. It is stated—whether truly or not who shall say?—that Henry VIII., when the shadows of death were gathering round him, had intended to grant to the town for the support of the Trent bridge the possessions of the chantry of St. Mary in St. Mary's Church. The advisers of the boy king who succeeded him granted, in the name of Edward VI., these properties for that useful purpose. Without entering into the question whether these confiscations were just or not, we can have no doubt that the income was better employed in the improvement of the town than if it had been squandered among courtiers or given to those who had done some of the dirtier work of the recent changes. In 1547 mention is made of "horse brede." The meaning of this term was till recent days a puzzle to all men. The antiquary and the man whose delight was in the sports of the field were equally at a loss as to what horse-bread could signify. Yet there is hardly an old document relating to horses or travelling expenses in which it does not occur. Coarse bread for the use of horses was used in the Middle Ages, and we find it mentioned till late in the seventeenth century. Ben Jonson calls some one a "threadbare, horse-bread-eating rascal." Talfourd, in his 'Vacation Rambles,' written in 1845, says that somewhere near Chamounix his horses refreshed themselves with "large hunches of black bread." Du Chailu on several occasions mentions in his 'Land of the Midnight Sun' the horses being rewarded by slices of black bread. Some of the English portion of the volume is most curious. In 1610 a "crust to amend" a bridge is spoken of. The word is in use at this day in many parts of England. It means the outer planks of a tree, which when sawn are curved on one side. In the churchwardens' accounts of Louth, in Lincolnshire, we find under the year 1563 "for a crust of a plank to a brige." The glossary contains much of an interesting character.

NOVELS OF THE WEEK.

Little Miss Colwyn. By Adeline Sergeant. 3 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)

Acte. By Hugh Westbury. 3 vols. (Bentley & Son.)

The Last of the Cornets. By Col. Rowan Hamilton. 2 vols. (White & Co.)

The Quality of Mercy. By Harold Vallings. 2 vols. (Gardner & Co.)

A Scarlet Sin. By Florence Marryat. 2 vols. (Spencer Blackett.)

Lady Dobbs. By Emily Marion Harris. 2 vols. (Kegan Paul & Co.)

Beatrice. By H. Rider Haggard. (Longmans & Co.)

A Queen of Roses. By Baynton Foster. (Ward & Downey.)

The Lawton Girl. By Harold Frederic. (Chatto & Windus.)

IF in 'Little Miss Colwyn' Miss Sergeant invents no startlingly new situation, she at least shows an understanding of human nature not always to be found in modern novels. Moreover, her idea of the impulsive friendship between two schoolgirls of different social standing, with its not unnatural sequel, is both original and true to life. The enervating effect of a luxurious and too well-ordered existence upon the character of Margaret Adair is particularly well drawn; and if there is an inconsistency, it is, perhaps, that she should ever have had sufficient good sense and resolution to make friends with a governess-pupil in a fashionable school. Wyvis Brand reminds us that Rochester yet lives in fiction, and Lady Caroline is a good example of the gentle pressure which can be brought to bear by a smooth-tongued clever woman of the world. Of the heroine herself, perhaps the only complaint to be made is one easily forgiven, namely, that she is a little too "bright or good for human nature's daily food." Whether a middle-aged doctor, however fond of children, would be led to saddle himself in cold blood with a drunken wife for the sake of her disorderly young family may be a matter of conjecture. Most of the characters in the book are, however, more or less distinctive and well drawn, and her readers have to thank Miss Sergeant for an undoubtedly good and well-written story.

In 'Acte' Mr. Westbury has set himself the somewhat daring task of reviving the Neronian days of Rome and weaving them not so much into a romance as into a stirring sensational story. The thing is by no means done for the first time. 'The Gladiators' and other tales have taken the same ground on different plans. We are very far from saying that 'Acte' is better done than these, though there is some good reading and a certain amount of brilliance in it. Of course, no new light is thrown on the time—how should it be? The events of it are, however, now and then skilfully and graphically utilized, and there is a kind of freshness in the manner and point of view. The lapse of centuries has proved no barrier; the author is quite undaunted by it—indeed, he is bright, confident, and we had almost said jaunty, in his way of treating the great ghosts of the past. Of course every one has his own conception of the personality of St. Paul, but it is not every one who would venture, as Mr. Westbury does, to introduce him into fiction as something not unlike a mild old revivalist gentleman of the Evangelical school. Nero himself is also closely and fearlessly followed, and occasionally Mr. Westbury makes good hits. He has "gone for" the artist nature with a vengeance. One is ready enough to admit the element in Nero, but it and the nineteenth century complexity of character, so to speak, are carried very far. In fact, or so it seems to us, there is too much of the manner familiar to readers of three-volume novels, and not an atom of distance and mystery. But there is spirit and cleverness to make up for these and other drawbacks.

It is a little difficult to discover a story in 'The Last of the Cornets.' Col. Rowan Hamilton is content to describe a succession of unexciting scenes precisely as he remembers them, or as they occur to his mind; and, as he possesses very little dramatic imagination, his incidents are apt to come out tamely enough. The greater part of his two volumes is filled by accounts of mess dinners, convivial meetings, races, and the like; his stage is occupied by one puppet after another, dangled for a few minutes and whisked away—more often than not without playing the slightest part in the drama. In short, 'The Last of the Cornets' is a string of anecdotes on a slender thread; and before the second volume comes to an end the thread is broken, and the beads are scattered on the floor.

Out of the men and women, half a dozen or so, who make up the dramatis personæ of 'The Quality of Mercy' four-fifths harbour purposes of revenge against their fellows, or, at least, determine never to forgive the injuries sustained at one another's hands. The actions and motives of these persons are strangely intermixed and involved, and so is the course of their lives. In spite of their resolutions of undying resentment all more or less forego their fell designs, modifying them to milder uses. A reader would be bloodthirsty indeed to look on this as an unmixed disappointment; he is, besides, apprised by the title that mercy, and not judgment, is the rule of the story; still there is a feeling that he has been trifled with, and that his sensibilities have been to some extent uselessly played upon. There is a death through broken heart, however, one from drowning, and two shooting cases of a fatal nature—not at all an unfair average considering the numbers. Some of the characters are well conceived and well carried out, others appear wanting in significance in spite of their prominent position; their mode of speech, too, is sometimes forced and unnatural. Tom Hadaway and his sweetheart are cases in point. Mr. Vallings appears to have rather a mean opinion of woman, judging from some specimens of the sex here portrayed. The fault of the book seems to lie in the difficulty of grasping what general effect the author really wished to produce. Still, there are good things about it; not the least is the impression conveyed of the natural features and appearance of the district described.

'A Scarlet Sin' is unamusing as well as unprofitable reading. The motive is unpleasant, and the treatment is more unpleasant still, for there is no grace of style or charm of manner to relieve its inherent offensiveness. In fact, so far as we may judge, it has nothing to recommend it, unless good print and careless fluency may be thought sufficient to redeem bad grammar and bad taste as well.

Lady Dobbs is a heroine of a rather objectionable type, handsome and insincere, who as a schoolgirl despises and slanders an unfortunate teacher, and afterwards, when the wife of a City knight, falls desperately in love with the said teacher, who has turned out to be a wealthy Russian count. This lovely Helen has a plain friend Amy, who paints her picture and exhibits it at the Academy. Count Eminesco is struck by the portrait, and perversely adores not the subject, but the painter.

"Before that picture now stood Amy, beholding it with the fond affection all young creatures burn before their young enterprises."

Both Amy and Helen are consoled for their troubles in the end. Their troubles are entirely of their own making, and Miss Harris describes them with some exaggeration, and in an inflated style which does not always find the reader on an eminence sufficiently high to appreciate it. Lady Dobbs is a remarkable woman, whom wayward love converts from a female nincompoop into a close student of Browning, and who dilutes her naughtiness by tying up florins for charitable purposes in her silk pocket-handkerchief. But there is not much harm left in her when the story is finished.

Mr. Rider Haggard has made many a bold venture, but perhaps he was never so bold as when he launched 'Beatrice.' 'Beatrice' is not dull, but we must frankly say that we prefer to read Mr. Rider Haggard when he deals with treasure, savages, big game, adventure—in a word, with Africa—than when he wanders into the realms of love and mesmerism and religion and there raves at large. 'Beatrice' is a love story pure and simple, and an unhappy love story to boot; for the heroine, lovely, noble, and true, is madly and devotedly in love with a man who had the misfortune to marry years before he met her, but who dislikes and despises his wife, and adores the beautiful Beatrice, from the moment when he first sees her and she saves his life from the sea, and thereby, according to Mr. Rider Haggard's version of the old belief, becomes bound to do him an injury. Geoffrey Bingham is a barrister, and with the help and counsel of Beatrice, who turns his Egeria, he wins fame in law and politics, and in the mean time brings her back from agnosticism to Christianity. Being virtuous, these unhappy lovers drag on their lives apart, save for an occasional relapse into a dread mesmeric communion. But Beatrice has an enemy in the shape of a sister Elizabeth, who for her own reasons and with fiendish malice seeks to drive Beatrice into sin and shame. Her machinations fail of their direct purpose, but they force the unhappy Beatrice to the conviction that she is her lover's bane, and that her death only will free him from trouble; and the gruesome story ends where it began—on the cruel waters of a stormy sea. There is no lack of strength in this book, but the subject is unpleasant and the treatment at times somewhat lacking in refinement. On the whole, it is difficult to regard 'Beatrice' as worthy of Mr. Rider Haggard's reputation.

'A Queen of Roses,' bearing a well-known quotation from Tennyson about a rosebud, is not of an original type. There is, indeed, a painfully familiar air about it, an almost "shocking tameness" in the arrangement of the people and their sayings and doings. In this case it is the farmer's, not the miller's, daughter who grows so dear as to (temporarily) disturb the peace of a youth of high degree. The girl's relatives we know of old—the good-natured, burly father, the hard-working, repressive aunt. She herself is far above her station and fair to see. The usual things happen that always do happen with such premises, yet all is mild as milk and innocent as buttercups. The reader is always told what Sweetbriar wore when bent on a clandestine appointment; also, how deeply, darkly blue were her eyes at such times. He is not surprised, either, when a gig accident, plus the loss of the lover, causes her to pine and die; and he knows too—more's the pity—that the last example of this class of story is yet to come.

'The Lawton Girl' exhibits the characteristic qualities of American novels of the day—a taste for detail in observation almost amounting to talent, a cultivated style not quite easy enough, a delay in coming to the point of the story, and an unfortunate want of consideration for the reader's patience. If such writers as Mr. Frederic are successful in America, as undoubtedly they are, America is a paradise for writers of ability without special gifts, and it is from several points of view pleasant that so praiseworthy a work as 'The Lawton Girl' should be a marketable commodity. But although it is a highly creditable work, a task commendably executed, it cannot be said to be a novel of striking interest, a story of much vigour or originality. One may even remark that it is disheartening to a conscientious reader to be introduced in the tenth chapter to a character "who has a considerable part to play in this story"; it would, at all events, have been more satisfactory to have met him sooner. Like most of the characters he is well drawn; and if one can wish that they all were made a little more interesting, one gladly admits that they present a collection of portraits of distinct individuality.

CLASSICAL TRANSLATIONS.

It would seem that the present generation, in default of original writers of a high order, is determined to distinguish itself by the excellence of its prose translations of ancient masterpieces. The list of works of this kind which have appeared within the last five-and-twenty years is truly remarkable. Not to mention the Revised Bible and other huge undertakings, we have had, from classical scholars only, Munro's 'Lucretius,' the 'Tacitus' of Messrs. Church and Brodribb, Lewis's 'Juvenal,' Conington's 'Persius,' Prof. Jowett's 'Plato' and 'Thucydides,' the 'Odyssey' of Mr. Butcher and Mr. Lang, the 'Iliad' of Messrs. Leaf, Lang, and Myers, Mr. Lang's 'Theocritus,' Mr. Mackail's 'Virgil,' Mr. Shuckburgh's 'Polybius,' and Mr. Macaulay's 'Herodotus.' Mr. Welldon's 'Aristotle,' Prof. Jebb's 'Sophocles,' Dr. Verrall's 'Æschylus,' and Mr. Dakyns's 'Xenophon' are appearing by instalments, a 'Livy' and a 'Pausanias' are promised, and others are known to be contemplated. It is a pretty safe guess that these books, protected partly by their merits and partly by their size, will hold the field for at least a century yet, and will outlive nearly all the other literature of their date. Among the translators themselves a very interesting tontine might be established, provided that Mr. John Payne, of the Villon Society, were barred, as a downright Titihonus. Of those whom we have named, perhaps Mr. Shuckburgh comes nearest to immortality. It is, however, not our immediate business to speculate on the remote future, but to introduce Mr. Macaulay's Herodotus, complete in two volumes (Macmillan & Co.), and Mr. Dakyns's Xenophon (same publishers), of which only the first volume is ready. Mr. Macaulay's task is the harder of the two, for Herodotus is not always easy to understand, and has, besides, a style and a subject which may well put a translator to some embarrassment. Like the innkeeper who checked Parson Adams's observations on the ground that "such things were only to be thought of in church," many people feel that an early writer, dealing with still earlier history, has acquired an odour of sanctity, and can only be translated in Biblical language. Mr. Macaulay "would resist this prejudication," as Paley used to say, but his own view is not very clear either from his professions or his practice. He says that Herodotus is not archaic, but has a poetical colouring which ought to be retained; but one would think from his translation that he had formed the converse distinction. A style, however, may be archaic or poetic in so many ways that it is useless to press these terms very hard without entering into a longer disquisition than is now proper. The following brief quotation is a fair specimen of Mr. Macaulay's style in a passage which must have cost him some thought:—

"When those of the Samians who had been driven out by Polycrates reached Sparta, they were introduced before the magistrates and spoke at length, being urgent in their request. The magistrates, however, at the first introduction replied that they had forgotten the things which had been spoken at the beginning, and did not understand those which had been spoken at the end. After this they were introduced a second time, and bringing with them a bag they said nothing else but this, namely, that the bag was in want of meal: to which the others replied that they had overdone it with the bag. However, they resolved to help them."

All the criticisms which might be made of this translation might be made of almost any other chapter in the two volumes. It is eminently correct; it is clear where the Greek is clear, and obscure where the Greek is obscure; it suggests the actual Greek words with striking fidelity; it leans to the antique, and it is quite unlike a tale told by an Englishman of any given date. On the other hand, the book at large is far more agreeable than any brief extract would make it appear, for it is big enough to have a style of its own, which begins to be pleasant so soon as it is familiar.

Mr. Dakyns, unlike Mr. Macaulay, has attempted to frame his English after a particular model, namely Goldsmith, with the result that his translation is very often superior to the original. The following is a fair specimen, from the first chapter of the sixth book of the 'Anabasis':—

"After this some Ænians and Magnesians got up and fell to dancing the Carpaia, as it is called, under arms. This was the manner of the dance: one man lays aside his arms and proceeds to drive a yoke of oxen, and while he drives he sows, turning him about frequently, as though he were afraid of something; up comes a cattle-lifter, and no sooner does the ploughman catch sight of him afar than he snatches up his arms and confronts him. They fight in front of the team, and all in rhythm to the sound of the pipe. At last the robber binds the countryman and drives off the team. Or sometimes the cattle-driver binds the robber, and then he puts him under the yoke beside the oxen, with his two hands tied behind his back, and off he drives."

This is not nearly so dry as the Greek, which is written with about as much spirit as Bædeker's guide-books or the catalogue of an exhibition of Old Masters. We should add that Mr. Dakyns's first volume contains the first two books of the 'Hellenica' and the whole of the 'Anabasis,' and that his translation is to extend to four volumes.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

MR. RUSSELL has given to English readers an admirable version of De Guimps's Life of Pestalozzi (Sonnenschein & Co.). It is a highly finished piece of work, betraying neither in idiom nor construction its French origin. Pestalozzi's long career, beginning about the middle of last century and lasting for more than four score years, shows how single-minded devotion to a worthy object accompanied by absolute self-abnegation may gain renown, if not immortality, for a man a large proportion of whose characteristics and actions seem to have merited oblivion rather than fame. M. de Guimps became a pupil at Yverdon at an early age, and remained there for nine years. His impression on first entering the class-room is akin to the first judgment the reader will form of Pestalozzi himself—it was a disagreeable one:—

"The room was very untidy, and the furniture and other things of such a primitive kind as to-day can hardly be imagined. There were tallow candles, for instance, without candlesticks or snuffers, and just held by a twisted wire stuck into a piece of wood. The language and cries, too, of all these Germans grated on my ear, and their manners seemed so strange that I felt as if I had suddenly been plunged into an atmosphere of gross vulgarity."

But as with the author, so with the reader of this biography, the impression is of short duration. Pestalozzi was primarily a philanthropist, and only became an educationist as it were by accident. He wished, as Jayet puts it, "to raise mankind," especially the humbler and more necessitous members of the race. He believed that education conducted on right methods would be the most potent engine to effect this; and so his whole energy, we may say his whole life, was devoted to the reform of education, not for the sake of education per se, but as a means of carrying out his philanthropic schemes. He ruined himself at Neuhof soon after his marriage; he ruined himself over and over again; he brought trouble and distress upon himself and his wife; he managed to estrange his best friends and most devoted followers; his institutions collapsed one after the other; but on the ruins of his life he succeeded in erecting by his example and his writings a rational method of elementary teaching, which, if his admirers would not impede its adoption by their unreasoning and unmeasured praise, must have a lasting and most beneficial effect on the progress of instruction—especially of rudimentary instruction. Pestalozzi's defects would have been serious enough in any one, but in an educator of children they were doubly disastrous—in the management of affairs, in the organization of a large, complicated institution, he was little short of imbecile; while his slovenliness of dress and manner (we might without unfairness characterize it more harshly), his inaccuracy of mind and unevenness of temper, must have been a terrible hindrance to all his efforts. To set against these defects he possessed in the highest degree qualities that never fail to win the affection and respect of the young—real goodness of heart, truthfulness, honest, unselfish devotion to the one great aim of his life, and a deep, loving sympathy with children. Mrs. Pestalozzi, who was some years older than her husband, counteracted many of his bad qualities, and softened and refined in him a good deal that was unseemly and grotesque. How much in the working out of his plans and in the elaboration of his method was due to this noble and gifted woman we can now hardly determine; perhaps Pestalozzi himself never knew. Certain it is that after her death troubles came thick and fast upon him, and he ultimately threw himself unreservedly, helplessly, into the hands of the not too scrupulous Schmidt. Pestalozzi's method "simply follows the path of nature." He is for ever insisting on the "organic law" in accordance with which man's whole nature is developed. This organic law should be followed in the earlier stages of instruction, and throughout school life, so far as the limiting conditions of the subjects of study will allow; unfortunately, the law may be, and often is, perverted in the hands of those who do not apprehend the subtle, but real spirit of the Pestalozzian system. M. de Guimps illustrates this educational law by the false analogy of the physical organism, the organs of which "are increased and strengthened by use and exercise only"—this, if not untrue, is at any rate misleading: increase and strengthening would speedily give place to decrease and withering without the assimilation of food. And if the analogy be pressed, the assimilation of food is analogous to the direct teaching that should succeed the stage of sense-impression. It is not easy to formulate with accuracy Pestalozzi's method; but the perusal of his life shows clearly enough wherein the true excellence of the system consists, although it will probably make the reader regard Pestalozzi himself as a warning rather than an example.

Two excellent works on war decorations existed before the publication of Mr. Hastings Irwin's account of the War Medals and Decorations issued to the British Military and Naval Forces from 1588 to 1889 (Upcott Gill), but of these Carter's only dealt with medals issued up to 1860 and Gibson's up to 1877. Mr. Irwin touches on medals, &c., which have been conferred during the last thirteen years. The first war medal ever given in England was that known as the "Ark in flood medal," which was bestowed by Queen Elizabeth on distinguished members of the navy. Similar medals were granted to the navy by James I. The first military medal of which we have any record was presented by Charles I. to Mr. Robert Welch for recapturing the royal standard at the battle of Edgehill. In May, 1643, Charles I. authorized the bestowal of silver medals upon such soldiers as might distinguish themselves in forlorn hopes. The earliest instance of the general grant of medals to all the officers and soldiers of an army was that of the issue of gold medals to the officers and silver medals to the men who conquered at Dunbar. The next occasion on which a medal was given to all the troops who were present in an action was the capture of Seringapatam in 1799. Her Majesty's reign has been remarkable not only for the lavish issue of medals, but also for the multiplication of orders. Up to 1814 the only military order was the Bath, of which there was only one class. In that year the order was enlarged and divided into three classes. In 1815 the Guelphic Order of Hanover was instituted, but was never much valued; and when on the death of William IV. the personal union between England and Hanover came to an end, the decoration ceased to be conferred on English officers. During Her Majesty's reign the following orders and decorations have been instituted or extended:—The Victoria Cross, St. Michael and St. George, the Star of India, the Indian Empire, the Crown of India, the medal for distinguished conduct in the field, the Royal Red Cross, the Albert Medal, and the Distinguished Service Order. These orders and decorations much need looking into. In the first place the Bath, Star of India, and Indian Empire are given often without reference to any fixed principle; in the second place there is an objectionable discrimination between ranks and between civilians and soldiers and sailors. One decoration for courage should be awarded to officers and men, civilians and soldiers and sailors indiscriminately, instead of the Distinguished Service in the Field Medal, the Distinguished Service Order, and the Albert Medal. In addition to the various medals and decorations given by the Crown there is in this book a long list of medals and decorations given by private individuals and the officers of a regiment. Some of these are of a most miscellaneous nature, and given for all sorts of reasons. In some cases the decoration was conferred for gallantry, in another for temperance, and in a third for markmanship. Of all these a most exhaustive list and description is to be found in the book before us.

We have received from M. Calmann Lévy Le Prince de Talleyrand et la Maison d'Orléans, by Madame de Mirabeau, a volume of letters mostly from Madame Adelaide to Talleyrand in 1834. They are interesting, though they contain nothing new. The usual carelessness of French editors comes out here and there. At p. 179 the illustrious George Canning is called "M. Catting."

Winters in Algeria is the title of a volume, apparently of American origin, published by Messrs. Chapman & Hall, and written and illustrated by Mr. F. A. Bridgman. It is harmless and unimportant; will be found readable by visitors to Algiers; but is hardly likely to have a wide circulation except among travellers, as the illustrations, though numerous and fair, are not excellent.

MRS. PANTON has already told persons of small means how to furnish their houses cheaply and prettily "from kitchen to garret," and then how to put a few extra touches to "nooks and corners," and now she runs over the ground again with a number of economical hints involving some repetition. Homes of Taste (Sampson Low & Co.) if it was better arranged would be a useful shopping guide; but it is really not much more than a desultory series of advertisements.

THE stories of village people of New England, which Miss May E. Wilkins has collected under the title of A Humble Romance (Edinburgh, Douglas), completely fulfil the expectations created by the author's preface. "They are studies of the descendants of the Massachusetts Bay colonists, in whom can still be seen traces of those features of will and conscience, so strong as to be almost exaggerations and deformities, which characterized their ancestors." The author tells her stories with much sympathy, and yet with an artist's power of keeping, so to speak, outside her work.

Prof. W. G. Elmslie, D.D.: Memoir and Sermons, by Dr. W. R. Nicoll and Mr. A. N. Macnicoll (Hodder & Stoughton), is a biography of a lamented professor of Hebrew in the Presbyterian College in London, followed by some sermons of the deceased and a reprint of an article of no great importance from the Contemporary Review. The memoir is fairly well written, but Dr. Nicoll has not contrived to give any very definite idea of the character of Dr. Elmslie. A biographer should not content himself with reprinting letters from admiring friends, but should endeavour himself to convey a clear impression of his hero to the reader. Dr. Nicoll has, to some extent, tried to do this, but not effectually. Nor is the memoir quite satisfactory in other respects. While unimportant details are mentioned, the increased attention paid of late years by Dissenting ministers and theological students to Hebrew—a fact which promises to have an important influence on the future of Nonconformity in England—is left without remark. Nor is much said even about Prof. Elmslie's own attainments as an Orientalist; how he, the busy minister of a Presbyterian chapel at Willesden, and the reader of a well-known firm of publishers, contrived to acquire the great knowledge of Hebrew with which his friends credited him.

We have received from the Emigrants' Information Office the volume which contains the twelve handbooks for the ten colonies possessing fully representative institutions (excluding Newfoundland), together with the eleventh, or Professional Handbook, and the twelfth, or General Handbook, the whole being included under the title of 'Handbook No. 13,' and printed for the Stationery Office. This volume is most excellent and useful, and is improved on each occasion of its issue. Its maps are admirable, and intending emigrants will find in 'Handbook No. 13' a perfect manual in which to compare the various colonies to which they would be likely to resort.

We have on our table St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland, by the Rev. A. Ryan (Dublin, Gill & Son),—English Texts, edited by J. Adam, M.A., and A. J. Cooper-Oakley, M.A., 4 vols. (Madras, Lawrence Asylum Press),—Routledge's Enlarged Ready Reckoner, by J. Heaton (Routledge),—Forty Lessons in Engineering Workshop Practice, by C. F. Mitchell and E. G. Davey, revised by J. Rogers (Cassell),—Force as an Entity, with Stream, Pool, and Wave Forms, by Lieut.-Col. W. Sedgwick (Low),—Railway Secrecy and Trusts, by J. M. Bonham (Putnam),—Personal and Social Evolution, with the Key of the Science of History, by an Historical Scientist (Fisher Unwin),—Evolution and Disease, by J. B. Sutton (Scott),—A Consideration of Gentle Ways, Essays, by E. Butler (Stock),—Gipsy Children; or, a Stroll in Gipsydom, with Songs and Stories, by G. Smith (Woodford, Fawcett & Co.),—The Day-School Hymn-Book, with Tunes, edited by Emma Mundella (Novello & Co.),—The Queen of the Black Hand, by H. C. Davidson (Trischler & Co.),—Niagara Spray, by J. Hollingshead (Chatto & Windus),—Eric Rotherham, by Mrs. W. D. Hall (Digby & Long),—Sadi: Gulistan or Flower-Garden, translated, with an Essay, by J. Ross (Scott),—Arius the Libyan (Appleton & Co.),—The Haunted Fountain, by K. S. Macquoid (Spencer Blackett),—Stung by a Saint, by Sir Gilbert Campbell, Bart. (Simpkin),—Laura Montrose, by A. May (Digby & Long),—Queen Elizabeth, a Drama, by A. E. Tregelles (Darlington, Dodds),—Songs and Poems, by C. W. Grace (Authors' Co-operative Publishing Co.),—Sonnets and Poems, by W. Garden (Gall & Inglis),—Shakespeare's Much Ado about Nothing, edited by A. W. Verity (Rivingtons),—A Singer in the Outer Court, by Alice F. Barry (Biggs & Debenham),—In Cloud and Sunshine, by J. Pierce (Trübner),—A Little Book, Poems, by G. H. Kersley (Bickers & Son),—Our Title Deeds, by the Rev. M. Fuller (Griffith & Farran),—The Book of Psalms, translated out of the Original Hebrew (Oxford, University Press),—The Sunday A B C, by C. B. S. (Roper & Drowley),—The Smaller Cambridge Bible for Schools: St. Mark, with Map, Introduction, and Notes, by the Rev. G. F. Maclear, D.D. (Cambridge, University Press),—A Plea for Truth in Religion (Kegan Paul),—High Days of the Christian Year, by the Very Rev. A. Tait, D.D. (Griffith & Farran),—The Evolution of a Life, by the Rev. H. T. Bray, LL.D. (Chicago, Holt Publishing Co.),—Les Communes Françaises, by A. Luchaire (Hachette),—Freytag's Aus dem Staat Friedrichs des Grossen, edited by H. Hager (Boston, U.S., Heath),—La Genèse de l'Idée de Temps, by M. Guyau (Paris, Alcan),—Lebens-erinnerungen eines Deutschen Malers, Selbstbiographie, by Ludwig Richter, edited by H. Richter (Frankfort, Alt),—Rembrandt als Erzieher, von einem Deutschen (Leipzig, Hirschfeld),—Hissarik-Ilion, Protokoll der Verhandlungen zwischen Dr. Schliemann und H. Boetticher, 1889 (Leipzig, Brockhaus),—Piron's La Métromaine, Comédie en Cinq Actes, edited by L. Delbos (Boston, U.S., Heath),—Die Loci Communes Philipp Melancthon's in ihrer Urgestalt nach G. L. Plitt, by D. Th. Kolde (Leipzig, Deichert),—Der Klassische Unterricht und die Erziehung zu Wissenschaftlichen Denken, by Dr. G. Neudecker (Nutt),—and Riehl's Kulturgeschichtliche Novellen, edited by J. F. Davis (Hachette). Among New Editions we have Delecourt's French Instructor (Heywood),—Scottish Philosophy, by A. Seth (Blackwood),—Health Notes for Students, by B. G. Wilder (Putnam),—Cross Lights, by H. B. Simpson (Allen & Co.),—Miss Mephistopheles, by F. Hume (White & Co.),—and A City Girl, by J. Law (Authors' Co-operative Publishing Co.).

LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

ENGLISH.

Theology.

Jesus, the Carpenter of Nazareth, by a Layman, cr. 8vo. 7/6
Kilien's (W. D.) The Framework of the Church, 8vo. 9/ cl.
McNeill's (Rev. J.) Regent Square Pulpit, Vol. 1, cr. 8vo. 3/6
McPherson's (Rev. J. G.) Summer Sundays in a Strathmore Parish, Sermons, cr. 8vo. 5/ cl.
Sermon Bible, Vol. 5, New Text, cr. 8vo. 7/6 cl.
Taylor's (Rev. J. W.) In a Country Manse, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Thomson's (Rev. W. D.) Revelation and the Bible, 12mo. 3/6
Virgin Mother (The) of Good Counsel: New Month of Mary, compiled by a Nun, 32mo. 2/ cl.

Fine Art.

Lovett's (Rev. R.) London Pictures drawn with Pen and Pencil, imp. 8vo. 8/ cl.
Turner's (J. M. W.) Libra Stadium, A Selection from, with Introduction by F. Wedmore, 82/6 portfolio.

Poetry and the Drama.

Cameo Series: Inhigenia in Delphi, a Dramatic Poem, translated by R. Garnett, cr. 8vo. 3/6 half bd.
Gour's (H. S.) Stepping Bonnets, and other Poems, 2/6 swd.
Hake's (T. G.) New Day, Sonnets, cr. 8vo. 5/ cl.
Poems of the Past, by Moi-Même, 18mo. 3/6 cl.
Thackeray's (F. St. J.) Translations from Prudentius in English Verse, roy. 16mo. 6/ cl.
Thorne's (J. L.) Stanley, a Drama, 12mo. 3/6 cl.
Toussie's (W.) Lays for Common Life, cr. 8vo. 5/ cl.
Whistle Binkle, a Collection of Songs from the Social Circle, 2 vols. 18mo. 4/ cl.

History and Biography.

Buchanan (G.), Humanist and Reformer, a Biography, by E. H. Bennet, 8vo. 12/ cl.
Greswell's (Rev. W. Parr) History of the Dominion of Canada, cr. 8vo. 7/6 cl.
Morrison's (W. D.) The Jews under Roman Rule, cr. 8vo. 5/ cl. (Story of the Nations.)
Torrens's (W. M.) Memoirs of William Lamb, Second Viscount Melbourne, cr. 8vo. 2/ cl.

Geography and Travel.

Duncan's (S. J.) A Social Departure: How Orthodoxy and I went round the World by Ourselves, cr. 8vo. 7/6 cl.
Golden South, Memoirs of Australian Home Life, 1843-1889, by Lyth, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.

Philology.

Laurie's (S. S.) Lectures on Language, 12mo. 4/ cl.
Sæet's (H.) A Primer of Spoken English, 12mo. 3/6 cl.

Science.

Campbell's (H.) Flushing and Morbid Blushing, their Pathology and Treatment, 8vo. 10/6 cl.
Christy's (M.) The Birds of Essex, 8vo. 15/ cl.
MacDonald's (G.) Treatise on Diseases of the Nose and its Accessory Cavities, cr. 8vo. 10/6 cl.
Mills's (F. W.) The Art and Practice of Interior Photography, 8vo. 7/6 cl.
Moore's (Sir W.) Constitutional Requirements for Tropical Climates, cr. 8vo. 4/ cl.
Watson (W.) and Bean's (W.) Orchids, their Culture and Management, cr. 8vo. 15/6 cl.

General Literature.

Bennett-Edwards's (Mrs.) Saint Monica, a Wife's Love Story, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Besant's (W.) Herr Paulus, cheap edition, cr. 8vo. 2/ bds.
Croker's (T. C.) Fairy Legends and Traditions of South of Ireland, cr. 8vo. 3/6 bds.
Dowling's (E.) Miracle Gold, cr. 8vo. 2/ bds.
Esler's (E. H.) The Way of Transgressors, 3 vols. 31/6 cl.
Godwin's Political Justice, a Reprint of the Essays on Property, edited by H. B. Salt, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Hocking's (S. K.) Her Benny, illustrated, 8vo. 6/ cl.
Hope's (A.) A Man of Mark, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
Howells's (W. D.) The Shadow of a Dream, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
Jusserand's (J. J.) The English Novel in the Time of Shakespeare, translated from French by E. Lee, 8vo. 21/ cl.
Keith's (B.) True Courage, and other Stories, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Kerr's (J.) History of Curling, 8vo. 10/6 bds.
Laird of Logan (The), or Anecdotes and Tales illustrative of the Wit and Humour of Scotland, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Lawless's (Hon. E.) With Essex in Ireland, Extracts from a Diary, 1599, kept by Mr. H. Harvey, cr. 8vo. 7/6 cl.
McCarthy (Justin) and Frazer's (Mrs. C.) The Ladies' Gallery, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Norris's (W. E.) Adrian Vidal, 12mo. 2/ bds.
Puckle's (J.) The Club, or a Gray Cap for a Green Head, 2/3
Rampin's (C.) Tales of Old Scotland, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Robinson's (M.) A Woman of the World, 3 vols. cr. 8vo. 31/6
Russell's (W. C.) An Ocean Tragedy, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Sienkiewicz's (H.) With Fire and Sword, an Historical Novel of Poland, translated by J. Curtin, cr. 8vo. 10/6 cl.
Thackeray's Vanity Fair, illustrated, cr. 8vo. 2/ cl. (Waterloo Edition.)
Walford's (L. B.) Dick Netherby, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Waterhouse's (C. H.) Insignia Vitæ, or Broad Principles and Practical Conclusions, cr. 8vo. 5/ cl.
Westall's (W.) Strange Crimes, cr. 8vo. 5/ cl.
Williams's (W. M.) The Philosophy of Clothing, cr. 8vo. 4/

FOREIGN.

Archæology.

Ephemeris Epigraphica, cura Th. Mommseni, I. B. Rossii, O. Hirschfeld, Vol. 7, Part 3, 5m.
Lanczkowski (K. Graf): Städte Pamphyliens u. Pisidiens, Vol. 1, 100m.

Poetry.

Fastenrath (J.): Catalanische Troubadours der Gegenwart Verdeutscht, 8m.

Palæography.

Catalogus Codicum Manuscriptorum in Bibliotheca Monasterii Mellicensis, Vol. 1, 14m.

Philosophy.

Erhardt (F.): Mechanismus u. Teleologie, 3m. 60.
Feidegg (F. Ritter von): Das Gefühl als Fundament der Weltordnung, 5m.
Schwarz (J.): Kritik der Staatsformen d. Aristoteles, 6m.
Wolff (H.): Kosmos, 2 vols. 15m.

History and Biography.

- Beauregard (C. de): Les Dernières Années du Roi Charles Albert, 7fr. 50.
 Bridier (Abbé): Mémoires de l'Internonce à Paris pendant la Révolution, 7fr. 50.
 Druffel (A. v.): Kaiser Karl V. u. die Römische Curie, Part 4, 3m. 30.
 Ferry (J.): Le Tonkin et la Mère-Patrie, 3fr. 50.
 Wallon (H.): Les Représentants du Peuple en Mission, 1793-1794, Vol. 5, 7fr. 50.

Philology.

- Curti (T.): Die Sprachschöpfung, 1m. 50.
 Reinisch (L.): Die Saho-Sprache, Vol. 2, 24m.

Science.

- Perrier (E.): Traité de Zoologie, Part 1, 12fr.
 Sorauer (F.): Atlas der Pflanzenkrankheiten, Series 4, 20m.

General Literature.

- Delaigue (A.): Paul Féval, 3fr. 50.
 Leroy-Beaulieu: La Révolution et le Libéralisme, 3fr. 50.
 Loti (P.): Le Roman d'un Enfant, 3fr. 50.

TWO VISIONS AT SEA.

I.
THE BOY'S VISION.
(A STARRY NIGHT.)

If heaven's bright halls are very far from sea,
 I dread a pang the angels could not 'suage:—
 The imprisoned sea-bird knows, and only he,
 How drear, how dark, may be the proudest cage:
 Outside the bars he sees a prison still:—
 The selfsame wood or meadow or silver stream
 That lends the captive lark a joyous thrill
 Is landscape in the sea-bird's prison-dream:

So might I pine on yonder starry floor
 For sea-wind, deaf to all the singing spheres:
 Billows like these that never knew a shore
 Might mock mine eyes and tease my hungry ears:
 No scent of amaranths o'er yon glittering vault
 Might quell this breath of ocean sharp and salt!

II.
THE MAN'S VISION.
(A TROPIC CALM.)

I hear the blackbirds singing in the grove,
 And now I see—I smell—the eglantine—
 The meadow-sweet where rivulets laugh and shine
 To English clouds that laugh and shine above!
 I feel a stream of maiden-music move,
 Pouring through all my body a life divine
 From this fond throbbing bosom clasped to mine—
 From this dear harp, her heart, whose chords are love!

Vanish'd!—

O God: a blazing world of sea—
 A blistered deck—an engine's grinding jar—
 Hot scents of scorching oil and paint and tar—
 And, in the offing yon fiery lee,
 One spot in the air no bigger than a bee—
 A frigate-bird sailing alone afar!*

THEODORE WATTS.

THE NINTH INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF ORIENTALISTS.

The following statement has been issued by the London Central Committee:—

The Organizing Committee for the ninth International Congress of Orientalists, to be held in London in September, 1891, represents a body of 300 Orientalists, belonging to twenty-two countries, who desire the maintenance of the "definitive statutes" and of the original principles adopted by the International Assembly of the first Congress of the series, held in Paris in 1873. These statutes and principles were followed by the subsequent Congresses in 1874 (London), 1876 (St. Petersburg), 1878 (Florence), 1881 (Berlin), 1883 (Leyden), 1886 (Vienna), and 1889 (Stockholm and Christiania). Their infringement having admittedly taken place at Christiania, their reassertion has become a necessity.

The statutes, while permitting every reasonable latitude as to local regulations, lay down certain simple rules regarding organization and procedure which have to be followed, and the principles they embody are unalterable in respect of the free and unofficial character of these gatherings, although the countenance and support of Governments, of municipal and other civic bodies, of learned societies, and of patrons of Oriental learning, have always been sought and given. These principles do not allow the attempted conversion of our private meetings of Oriental scholars and others interested in the promotion of Oriental studies into a close and official organization, in which any one or more persons, or any one or more nationalities, shall take a permanent lead or shall prescribe the qualifications of members of future Oriental Congresses.

Further, the International Congress of Orientalists, having to visit in turn, either yearly or every second or third year (as may be needed), the various countries in which there are Orientalists, cannot be changed, as is attempted, into an institute which, however international in name, has a permanent location in any one country, or is, substantially, national rather than international, especially after such a proposal had been rejected by three-fourths of the delegates assembled at Christiania, and has been condemned by all independent members of the first and subsequent Congresses, to whom an "Appeal" and "Declaration" in favour of the statutes had been sent in October and November last.

The above considerations would amply justify the London Organizing Committee being called into existence, as it has been, by the unanimous vote of the supporters of the statutes. The first duty of the Committee, therefore, is to ensure the legality and to maintain the true continuity of the series of the International Congresses of Orientalists on the basis of the principles suited to a republic of Oriental letters. There is, however, also a technical raison d'être for the London Committee.

The next place for the meeting of the Congress not having been fixed at Christiania, the duty of doing so reverted to Paris by right, courtesy, and admissions at previous Congresses. The early signatories of the Appeal above referred to accordingly applied, in the first instance, to the members of the Commission Administrative of the first Congress, all of whom are still living, to exercise that right, and, if possible, in favour of Paris, as the most fitting place for the reassertion of the original principles. The members voted for London, and the survivors of the Comité de Permanence International of 1873 have since followed their lead. Of the signatories of the Declaration already referred to, 250 voted for London, 50 for Paris, 18 for Oxford, 4 for various towns in Switzerland, 2 for Belgium, and 1 for Bombay. London is, therefore, decided on by the great majority of Orientalists, and it is in London accordingly that the ninth Congress of the International series must be held. As for the year of the Congress, 1891 is similarly selected by the majority, a large minority voting for 1890, and only four for 1892.

Finally, at a meeting held in Paris on March 31st last, of the signatories of the Appeal and Declaration, including members of the Commission Administrative and of the Comité International of 1873, a resolution was passed, formally making over the powers under the statutes to the Organizing Committee for the ninth International Congress, to be held in London in September, 1891, and ratifying the resolutions accepted by the London meeting on January 15th last. At the conclusion of this meeting the founders drafted the invitation to be issued by the London Committee for the next Congress, to be held in London from the 1st to the 10th of September, 1891. That invitation also records the formal transfer of the powers of the founders to the London Committee, and it is accordingly issued by us on its behalf to members of the last and previous Congresses, to Orientalists generally, and to friends of Oriental studies.

G. W. LEITNER,
 ROBERT K. DOUGLAS, } Secretaries.
 E. W. BULLINGER,

London, May 14th, 1890.

Oxford, May 19, 1890.

I HAVE been requested to state for the information of Oriental scholars in England that nothing could have been further from the intention of many of those who, in reply to a private and perfectly legitimate circular, declared their predilection for Paris, London, or Oxford as the place for the next meeting of the International Congress of Oriental scholars, than to express thereby any disapproval of the resolutions passed at the last Congress at Stockholm and Christiania. They supposed that any formal invitation from Paris, London, Oxford, or any other place would be forwarded to the ex-presidents and be submitted by them to the International Committee.

Prof. Chwolson, of St. Petersburg, whose name has been so often quoted as an active supporter of the malcontent party, has requested the secretary of the last Congress to publish the following letter:—

"I declare hereby on my word of honour that, on receiving what seemed to me a perfectly innocent inquiry, whether I wished the next Congress to take place at Paris or in London, I declared for London. Other papers which contained offensive remarks about the last Congress were never signed by me. Nay, I sent a private letter to M. L., advising him to write to the Committee which was appointed at Christiania, and thus to preserve the continuity of our Congresses. I authorize you to make any use you like of this declaration—nay, I wish that you would have the kindness to publish it in some paper that is read at Stockholm."

May I add in my own name that the invitation from Oxford has not yet been officially accepted? Not till it has been thus accepted would it be competent for any one to elect the president and vice-presidents for the next Congress.

It was, of course, a mere accident that what Prof. Chwolson calls the innocent inquiry was never addressed to me and other members of the late Congress. But even if it had been addressed to all the 720 members, 250 could hardly be called a majority.

F. MAX MÜLLER,
 President of the Aryan Section at the last Congress at Stockholm and Christiania.

THACKERAYANA.

11, Savile Row, May 17, 1890.

I AM glad to learn from Mr. Garnett's letter in your issue of the 10th inst. that the Museum authorities have acquired so interesting a copy of the Govnsman. It is curious to see no less than two copies of this exceedingly rare work advertised for sale by Messrs. Sotheby & Co. on June 17th.

As explained in my articles in the Athenæum, my attribution to Thackeray of papers signed Θ rests not only on the signature, which was used afterwards by him in the Westminster Review, but also on the fact that I have seen the MS. of 'I'd be a Tadpole,' which appeared in the Govnsman, and is signed Θ.

There is, however, no reason to doubt that the papers signed ξ were also by Thackeray. He was certainly the author of the greater part of the Govnsman. I may mention among the hitherto unrecognized contributions the thoroughly Thackerayan 'Ballad of the Loves of Fanny Brown and Wm. Jones' (p. 93). If I remember rightly (I cannot now refer to the magazine), an extended and improved version will be found in an early number of Fraser's Magazine. The appearance in the two places seems to sufficiently identify it as Thackeray's work, and enables us to point to other very early contributions by him to Fraser's Magazine.

CHAS. P. JOHNSON.

LORD LOVAT.

In the article on Lord Lovat, by Mr. T. F. Henderson, in the 'Dictionary of National Biography' (vol. xx. p. 216) there are several difficulties that seem to be worth clearing up. 1. "According to his age at his death printed [?] on his coffin, and to several statements made by himself, he was born about 1667." It is true that the inscription on the coffin did run, "Simon Dominus Fraser de Lovat, decollat. April 9, 1747. Ætat. suæ 80." Still, in a letter of June 12th, 1746, to the Duke of Cumberland he wrote: "I can do more service to the king and government, than the destroying a hundred such like old and very infirm men like me, past seventy," &c. ('Life,' by Hill Burton, p. 249). 2. "When he had just taken the degree of M.A. in 1683, and was about to enter upon the science of civil law, his studies were interrupted by the proposal that he should accept a commission in the regiment of Lord Murray, afterwards Duke of Atholl. The proposal was, he states, extremely distasteful to him, and only assented to on the assurance that the design of Lord Murray in accepting the regiment was treacherously to aid King James with it in a descent he had promised to make during the ensuing summer." There surely is some confusion of dates here. Should 1693 be read for 1683? If so, it seems doubly probable that Simon Fraser was born about 1676 rather than 1667. 3. "Fraser raised a number of his followers,

* Low as the frigate-bird flies before a storm, it soars so high during a calm as to look, in the distance, like a black fly against the burning blue.

and falling in with Lords Saltoun and Tullibardine after they had left Castle Downie, captured them near Inverness, and conveyed them prisoners to the island of Aigas." Any one might imagine Aigas to be one of the Hebrides, whereas it is really in the river Beaulieu, quite close to Castle Downie (Beaufort Castle). 4. "Emilia, eldest daughter of the tenth lord, assumed, however, the title of Baroness of Lovat." She in September, 1696, can hardly have been more than a child of ten, if Hill Burton is right in dating her father's marriage contract "the 18th of May, 1685." 5. "Mar, writing in February, 1716, says, 'Lovat is the life and soul of the party; the whole country and his name dote on him; all the Frasers have left us since his appearing in the country.'" Is the date here not rather too late, as Mar quitted Scotland on the 3rd of February, 1716? To the list of authorities two works might have been added: Dr. Alexander ("Jupiter") Carlyle's 'Autobiography,' and Sir William Fraser's 'Chiefs of Grant' (2 vols. 4to. 1883), which contains an immense mass of fresh information relating to Lovat, and of which there was an admirable summary in the Edinburgh Review for July, 1884. Lastly, between Lord Lovat and the "Master of Ballantrae" (Mr. R. L. Stevenson's late admirable creation) is there not something more than an accidental resemblance? The real man, though, is the wicked.

FRANCIS HINDS GROOME.

SALES.

IN the sale of the library of the late Dr. Percy by Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge the following books realized high prices: Annales des Mines, complete from the beginning in 1796, 81l. Jahresbericht der Chemie, from the commencement in 1847, 23l. Pamphlets on Iron, Steel, Gold, Silver, Education, &c., a large series, 28l. Philosophical Magazine, 1832-89, 20l. Poliphili Hypnerotomachia, Venetia, 1499, 52l. Ruskin, Modern Painters, 5 vols., 1848-60, 26l. 5s. Sowerby, Thesaurus Conchyliorum, 29l. Yarrell, History of British Birds, first edition, with both supplements, largest paper, 30l. 10s. Royal Society Philosophical Transactions from 1847 to 1888, 26l. Turner, Views on the Southern Coast, 1814-1826, 25l. 10s. The sale realized 1,949l. 3s.

The sale, which is to occupy twenty-one days, of the choicer portion of the extensive and valuable library of the late Sir Edward Sullivan, Bart., Lord Chancellor of Ireland, commenced on Monday, the 19th inst., at the rooms of Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge. Amongst the most notable articles sold during the first three days were: First Aldine Dante, 13l. Aldine Poets, 26l. 15s. Walton and Cotton Club Regulations, 21l. 10s. Aristoteles de Moribus, from the library of Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, 31l. 10s. Bible printed by Watson in 1715, superbly bound by Roger Payne, 62l. (cost Sir Edward Sullivan 35l.). Boece, Cronykles of Scotland, several pages facsimiled, 25l. 10s. Bruno, Candalaio, 20l. The first three days produced 1,632l. 17s.

'THE NEEDY KNIFE-GRINDER.'

Christ's College, Cambridge, May 14, 1890.

THE review that appeared in the Athenæum of May 3rd upon Mr. Edmonds's edition of the 'Poetry of the Anti-Jacobin' has led me to seek whether any further information could be obtained concerning the Rev. Peter Fraser, whom the reviewer holds to have been the author of 'The Needy Knife-grinder.' For the following details I am mainly indebted to the Rev. J. Clark, the present rector of Kegworth, and to the Rev. J. W. Cartmell, tutor of Christ's College. Mr. Clark joined the college in 1835, and was for many years tutor, eventually proceeding to Kegworth shortly after Fraser's death in 1852. Inasmuch as Fraser was also a Fellow of this college (and not, as Crabb Robinson erroneously states, of Corpus Christi), and held the same college living, it would be difficult to obtain information from a better source.

Fraser graduated M.A. in 1798, and as 'The Needy Knife-grinder' appeared in the Anti-Jacobin of November 27th, 1797, the statement ascribed to Fraser by Robinson, that he wrote the poem in question when an undergraduate, certainly stands the chronological test. That he was a powerful and brilliant writer is sufficiently indicated by the position he held for years upon the Times. As Crabb Robinson declares, "he was the writer of the great leaders—the flash articles that made a noise"; and there is an indication of his distaste for public recognition in the further statement of this intimate friend that "he was never made known as editor or writer, and would probably have thought it a degradation." Mr. Clark informs me that his connexion with the Times was said to have arisen from an anonymous letter written by him to that paper when a young curate.

He was a great friend of Canning, who is stated to have offered him an Irish bishopric, and he was held in high repute at the Foreign Office. An excellent linguist, and frequently upon the Continent, known to both Talleyrand and Metternich, he would seem to have been employed by the Government to make confidential reports. Doubtless in this employment his clerical attire stood him in good stead.

Upon becoming rector of Kegworth he obtained also the living of Bromley in Middlesex, with a house in Spring Gardens, apparently both either directly from the Government or through their influence. Thus he was enabled to be absent from Kegworth the greater part of the year. His library of many thousand books he left to Christ's College; it is especially rich in foreign literature and works bearing upon continental history. Among all these I can find but one production to which his name is attached as author, and that a small pamphlet written in 1846 during the height of the Tractarian movement—a translation of the work of a seceding French priest, Maurette's 'Adieux au Pape.'

Mr. Clark has kindly sent me the epitaph upon the tablet above Fraser's grave in the chancel at Kegworth. Part of this I transcribe: "Per aliquot annos | In negotiis publicis | Tam domi quam peregre tractandis | Non infelicitur nec sine patrie commodo laboravit | Aliis claritudinis auctor | Ipse fere ignotus....."

Occurring in any epitaph these last lines would arrest attention; in connexion with Fraser's own statement to his friend concerning 'The Needy Knife-grinder' and the Anti-Jacobin, they are almost a revelation. J. G. ADAMI.

P.S.—In connexion with Crabb Robinson's mistake with reference to Fraser's college it would seem—although to write upon such matters is difficult—that the time has arrived to point out to those ignorant of Cambridge that Christ's and Corpus Christi are two distinct colleges; and I am led to add from the frequent mistakes that are made, examples of which have come to my notice during but the last few weeks, that the former is not otherwise known as Christchurch.

 We hardly "held" that Fraser wrote 'The Needy Knife-grinder.' We merely quoted Crabb Robinson's hitherto unpublished statement.

MR. GEORGE HOOPER.

THE death is announced of a veteran journalist, Mr. George Hooper. He was one of several clever men who were connected with the Leader. Subsequently he acted as sub-editor to Mr. Rintoul on the Spectator, and with that paper he is understood to have retained his connexion more or less constantly until his decease. From 1868 to 1871 he edited the Bombay Gazette, and on his return to England he became a leader-writer on the Daily Telegraph, a position he resigned in 1886. To the general public Mr.

Hooper was best known by his valuable contributions to military history. His 'Italian Campaigns of Bonaparte,' produced during the excitement caused by the Franco-Austrian war of 1859, had considerable success, and Mr. Hooper followed it up three years afterwards by a more elaborate work, 'Waterloo: the Downfall of the First Napoleon,' an admirable monograph, one of the best, in fact, written on the subject. On his escape from the fatigues of daily journalism Mr. Hooper returned to his favourite topics, and compiled a lucid account of the memorable events which brought about the catastrophe of Sedan. This was followed by a judicious biography of Wellington in the series styled "English Men of Action," which we reviewed in these columns more than a year ago.

Mr. Hooper's house was for years a gathering place for journalists and men of letters, and those who have spent many delightful evenings in the society he collected about him will not soon forget their genial host, whose stores of information were not more remarkable than his kindness and his uprightness of character.

Literary Gossip.

THE sub-committee of the Incorporated Society of Authors appointed to draft a Copyright Bill, and presided over by Sir Frederick Pollock, has finished its labours, and the Bill, when approved by the General Committee, will be presented to Parliament as that of the Society. Its main features resemble those of the Bill known as Lord John Manners's, which was proposed after the Royal Commission on Copyright had reported; but some improvements have been introduced, and the Bill, if accepted by Parliament, ought to give satisfaction to authors. Though no legislation concerning it can take place this session, yet an effort will be made to introduce the Bill into the House of Commons before Parliament rises, in order that it may be printed and discussed during the recess.

THE efforts of the Dominion Parliament to legislate to the detriment of British authors, though frustrated for the present, are not at an end. Sir John Thompson, the Minister of Justice, has intimated to a deputation of Canadian publishers that he intended "to continue urging upon Her Majesty's Government the right of the Canadian Parliament to legislate independently of the Imperial authority in regard to copyright in the Dominion." The right of the Dominion Parliament to legislate for Canadian authors may be indisputable; but why attempt to deprive British authors of the protection accorded to them by the Imperial Parliament? Lord Sherbrooke is credited with saying that this country lost America because the American colonists would not permit us to rob them, and that we should lose other colonies because we would not permit them to rob us. It is to be hoped that the poor British author is not to be made the pretext for separation on the part of the Canadian Government.

A CONSIDERABLE number of Mohammedan gentlemen came from London, Cambridge, and other places to the Oriental Institute at Woking on Wednesday last, in order to celebrate the I'd festival at the mosque which is in connexion with the Institute. After the conclusion of the religious ceremonies, which were conducted by some of the Mohammedan residents at the Institute, the members of that creed present on the occasion, whether belonging to the Sunni, Shiah, or other Mohammedan persuasions, embraced one another fraternally and adjourned to the meal that marks the conclusion of the month of Ramazan, during which "the faithful" are obliged to fast. Mohammedans generally recognize the spirit of toleration that has made it possible for them to worship in this country, whose ruler, the Kaisar-i-Hind, has more Mohammedan subjects than any other monarch.

MESSRS. J. M. DENT & Co. will publish in the autumn as the new issue of their "Temple Library" 'The Poetical Works of Thomas Lovell Beddoes,' edited with a memoir by Mr. Edmund Gosse, in two volumes. The text will include the 'Improvisatore' of 1820—which has never been reprinted, and of which only two or three copies are known to exist—and various poems now published for the first time. The text will be founded on the MSS. left by Mr. Kelsall to Mr. Robert Browning, and by Mr. Browning placed in Mr. Gosse's hands. The original editions of Beddoes have now become very scarce.

THE second volume of the 'Century Dictionary,' extending from Conoccephalus to the musical abbreviation Fz., will be published shortly. A third of the whole work, to be contained in six volumes, will thus be completed. Among the words most exhaustively treated will be found element, to which a page is devoted. The simple form of the word draw is expounded under thirty different heads. A number of illustrations of botany and natural history will appear, as many words derived from these sciences come within the scope of the second volume.

MR. KITTON is going to issue a supplement to 'Charles Dickens by Pen and Pencil' in four parts, containing many contributions from relatives, friends, and contemporaries of Dickens, including his eldest daughter, his brother-in-law Mr. Burnett, Mrs. Thackeray-Ritchie, Madame Viardot, Prof. Berger, &c. There will be at least eight portraits of Dickens, and over forty other illustrations.

Blackwood's Magazine for June will contain a contribution on the Nile Campaign of 1889, in which Col. Wodehouse's operations against Wad el Najumi are detailed and criticized with great minuteness, and full accounts are given of the battles of Argin and Toski. Among other articles in the same number will be recollections of 'The Last of the Rydal Dorothys,' Mrs. Harrison, of Green Bank, and an account of the fortunes of the two Buccleuch heiresses, whose marriages were celebrated under such romantic circumstances in the middle of the seventeenth century.

MR. WORTH is revising his 'History of Plymouth,' published in 1872, which has been for some time out of print. Partly in consequence of continued research, but partly owing to fortunate accidents which have brought to light sources of information lost for centuries, the materials for the history of Plymouth are far bulkier and more trustworthy now than they were twenty years ago, while the archives of the Corporation have been systematically examined and arranged. The result is that the present volume is twice the size of its predecessor.

PROF. S. R. DRIVER, of Oxford, is to contribute a memorial article on the late Dr.

Franz Delitzsch to the June number of the Expository Times.

It is announced that the classes and higher lectures at Queen's College, Harley Street, are to be arranged on a new basis. The practical result of the changes is, we believe, to provide an alternative to the London University Arts course, admitting of much more freedom and variety in the choice of subjects, and entitling the successful student to the "fellowship" of the college. Facilities will be given for girls entering the college from schools of the first grade, as well as those previously educated there, to take up the higher work and qualify for the superior diploma.

THE Rev. John Venn, grandson of the author of 'The Complete Duty of Man,' and himself a well-known theological writer, died at Hereford on Monday, the 12th inst., in his eighty-ninth year. Mr. Venn's father was Rector of Clapham, a leading spirit in what was nicknamed the Clapham sect, and intimately associated with Wilberforce, Clarkson, and Zachary Macaulay. The deceased was the oldest surviving member of the Simeon Trust, and his family is said to show an unbroken line of Evangelical clergymen from the time of the Reformation.

IN the June number of East and West there will be an article by Stepniak concerning Russian outrages, an essay by Maxwell Gray, a short story by the author of 'The House of the Wolf,' and a life of 'Christopher Plantin: the Famous Printer of Antwerp,' by Mr. G. S. Macquoid.

MR. JOHN DENNIS has in the press a selection from the poems of Aubrey de Vere. It will be published by Messrs. Cassell & Co.

DR. S. A. HIRSCH, theological tutor at Jews' College, has undertaken the editorship of the Jewish Standard.

THE Oriental MSS. collected by the late Mr. T. F. Hughes are to be sold by auction. The Athenæum of July 2nd, 1887, contained a notice of the services of this distinguished Turkish scholar.

At a general meeting of the Index Society, held at the rooms of the Society of Arts on Wednesday, the 21st inst., it was unanimously agreed that the Index Society should be amalgamated with the recently established British Record Society. Four members of the Index Society were elected on the council of the British Record Society at the meeting of the latter society on May 1st, in expectation of this amalgamation taking place.

DR. HAKE writes:—

"Will you allow me to correct through the medium of your columns an error of a peculiarly vexing kind in my volume of sonnets, 'The New Day,' just issued? As it now stands the third quatrain of the ninety-first sonnet lacks the first line. It should stand thus:—

Ready to bend to Nature's high behest,
Select for us a fitting burial spot,
That we within her reach may ever rest,
And never by our country be forgot!"

WE have to announce the death of Mr. Thomas Beet, for many years a well-known bookseller in Bond Street and Conduit Street; of Dr. W. K. Sullivan, President of Queen's College, Cork; and of the Rev. Dr. Gotch, head of the Baptist College at Bristol.

DESTOOR JAMASPJI MINOCHEHERJI, hon. D.C.L.Oxon., has presented his ancient MS. of the Yasna, with Sanskrit translation, to the Bodleian Library. This MS. was mentioned by us not long since as on loan to Dr. Mills for the purpose of collation. It is the oldest Yasna MS. with Sanskrit translation extant, and both Yasna text and Sanskrit translation are of the first importance. The Bodleian now possesses two MSS. of the Zend Avesta which are surpassed in age and value by no others. A good portion of this MS. last given has been photographed. For this generous gift, following so closely on his donation of the ancient MS. with Pahlavi translation, the venerated high priest deserves the thanks of all English scholars.

MESSRS. SONNENSCHN & Co. have in the press a manual on 'The Boarding-Out System,' by Mr. Henry F. Aveling, clerk to the Paddington board of guardians. It will deal with modern legislation relating to the protection of children and infant life, and will be written for the use more particularly of poor-law guardians, boarding-out committees, and practical workers in philanthropy.

A RUSSIAN-CHINESE dictionary has just been produced by the joint efforts of the Archimandrite Palladius and M. Popow, first dragoman of the Russian Legation at Peking. The Chinese used is the Peking dialect; but it is a grave defect that the Chinese characters are rendered on a tonic principle, and the book's practical use is, therefore, much curtailed. The Russian Government contributed ten thousand roubles towards the production of the work.

THE June number of the Bookworm will contain an in memoriam notice of the late William Blades, accompanied by a new portrait.

MR. ELLIOT STOCK is going to issue the original text of the poetical books of the Old Testament in roman type, accompanied by a translation into corresponding English measures and cadences by Mr. Castle Cleary.

THE extra summer holiday number of All the Year Round will consist of a complete story written by Miss Mary Angela Dickens, a granddaughter of the late Charles Dickens.

THE editor of the Newbery House Magazine promises in the last six months of the year, July to December, to issue articles on 'The Practice of Medicine in the Ancient East,' by Prof. Sayce; 'Some Notes on the History of Children's Books,' by Mr. Charles Welsh, the author of 'A Bookseller of the Last Century'; 'Desultory Notes from Bordighera,' by Madame Villari; 'Old St. Paul's Churchyard,' by Mr. H. W. Brewer, illustrated; 'The Anglo-Saxon Race as a Civilizing Agency in Asia,' by Prof. Vambéry; and "'Viz.," " &c.," "Don't,"" by Canon Isaac Taylor.

It seems that the drawings Mr. Cosens had by H. K. Browne, which we mentioned last week, were not the original drawings, but a set done subsequently by the artist for Mr. Cosens. Mr. Cosens had the original drawings by Mr. Fildes for 'Edwin Drood.'

A NEW work on 'The Arthurian Legend,' by Prof. Rhys, will shortly be issued from the Clarendon Press. It is based on two unpublished lectures delivered in the course of Hibbert Lectures for 1886. The author's view is that there was both an historic Arthur and a Brythonic divinity of the same name, and that the group of legends which surround that name is of purely Celtic origin.

DR. ALFONS BELLESHEIM, the author of a 'History of the Roman Catholic Church in Scotland,' will shortly issue a kindred work under the title of 'Geschichte der Katholischen Kirche in Irland, von der Einführung des Christenthums bis auf die Gegenwart.' The history, which is said to be based on researches made by the learned author at the British Museum, and in the Vatican and public archives of Rome, will consist of three volumes.

The fifth and concluding volume of Prof. von Sybel's 'Begründung des Deutschen Kaiserreiches' is expected to make its appearance during the present season.

The second and last volume of the autobiography of the popular German novelist Fr. Spielhagen is expected to be published shortly. The work is issued under the title of 'Finder und Erfinder: Erinnerungen aus meinem Leben.'

The nineteenth meeting of the "Hansische Geschichtsverein" will be held on the 27th and 28th inst. at Osnabrück. Among the various papers to be read at the meeting there will be one, by Dr. Kunze, of Cologne, on 'Die Hanse und England im Vierzehnten Jahrhundert.'

The chief Parliamentary Papers of the week are Public Accounts, Evidence to Second Report from the Committee (10d.); East India, Estimate of Revenue and Expenditure for 1889-90 (2d.); Public-Houses, Paper showing various Interests on Death of Leaseholder and Freeholder Publicans, Brewers, &c. (1d.); Statement as to Number of Paupers relieved on January 1st, 1890, in England and Wales (5d.); Correspondence relating to Sir L. Simmons's Mission to the Vatican relative to Religious Questions in Malta (3d.); Report on Intermediate and Elementary Education in Russia (2d.); Report on Education in Hungary (2d.); and the following among the annual series of Trade Reports: France, Trade of Bordeaux (3d.); Egypt, Trade of Port Said (1d.); Turkey, Trade of Damascus (1d.).

SCIENCE

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

Adventures in the Great Forest of Equatorial Africa and the Country of the Dwarfs. By P. Du Chaillu. (Murray).—A generation has passed away since Mr. P. Du Chaillu produced a great stir in the scientific world by the publication of his 'Explorations and Adventures in Equatorial Africa.' The bitter controversy which arose on the publication of this book has happily passed away, and the good faith and veracity of the author have been placed beyond doubt by more recent explorers. Even now there are extensive districts between the coast and the Ogowe which no European has visited since Du Chaillu's days, and, as his original books of travel have long been out of print, it was a happy idea to condense them into one popular volume. Mr. Du Chaillu is a vivacious writer, and his new volume will afford pleasure and instruction to all who have not yet read his former works or who wish to refresh their memories.

The second and third volumes of the fourth edition of Mr. Chambers's useful and interesting Handbook of Descriptive and Practical Astronomy have appeared (Oxford, Clarendon Press), completing the work in its enlarged form. The second is on 'Instruments and Practical Astronomy,' but contains also sections on 'Chronological Astronomy' and 'Astronomical History and Bibliography,' besides which Mr. Maunder, of the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, has rewritten and carefully brought up to date the portions contributed by him to the previous edition at the author's request on "Spectroscopic Astronomy" and "Astronomical Photography." The third volume is on 'The Starry Heavens,' and this portion of the work has also been thoroughly revised, with several valuable additions, particularly that of a Catalogue of Naked-eye Stars, arranged in constellations, and giving the photometric determinations of the star-magnitudes. We cannot but regret, however, especially as no annual variations are given, that the date of this useful catalogue is so far back as 1880.

Advanced Physiography, by John Thornton (Longmans & Co.), is an expansion of the author's 'Elementary Physiography,' intended to meet the requirements of the syllabus of the Science and Art Department. Within the limits thus prescribed for him the author deals with his subject in a thoroughly satisfactory manner. The results of recent research have been made use of, and the explanations are lucid. Examination papers form a useful appendix.

A Class-Book of Geography, Physical, Political, and Commercial, by William Balfour Irvine (Relfe Brothers), is a rich treasury of facts, arranged on the old popular plan preferred by many practical teachers. Physical geography occupies quite a subordinate part, the bulk of the space being devoted to topographical data and statistics. The book is by no means free from errors, and some of these are quite unpardonable, as, for instance, the statement that South Africa comprises three independent states, one of which is the "New Republic."

FROM Messrs. Longman there reaches us A Smaller Commercial Geography, by Mr. Chisholm, condensed from 'Chisholm's Handbook of Commercial Geography.' It is excellent as regards matter, and a handbook of commercial geography is, perhaps, not the place in which to look for style. The style is peculiar. Of Spain, for example, we find: "Climate.—The climate is somewhat unfavourable to density of population as well as the physical features." This language seems to imply that the climate is unfavourable to the physical features; but we presume that what Mr. Chisholm means is that the climate and the physical features of Spain are alike unfavourable to density of population, which, on the whole, may not be true, of the climate at least, but which is intelligible.

SOCIETIES.

GEOLOGICAL.—May 14.—Dr. A. Geikie, President, in the chair.—Mr. G. W. Lamplugh and Mr. A. Timmins were elected Fellows.—The following communications were read: 'The so-called Upper-Lias Clay of Down Cliffs,' by Mr. S. S. Buckman, 'On some New Mammals from the Red and Norwich Crag,' by Mr. E. T. Newton, 'On Burrows and Tracks of Invertebrate Animals in Palaeozoic Rocks, and other Markings,' by Sir J. W. Dawson, and 'Contact-alteration at New Galloway,' by Miss M. I. Gardiner, communicated by Mr. J. J. H. Teall.

NUMISMATIC.—May 15.—Dr. J. Evans, President, in the chair.—Mr. A. Ricketts was elected a Member.—Mr. H. Montagu exhibited a series of silver crowns of James I., and read a paper on the subject of those of the second issue, the reverse legend of which is QVÆ DEVS, &c. The writer showed that Hawkins's classification of these coins was faulty, and that crowns both with and without the plumes over the shield on the reverse were struck between 1607 and 1621.—Dr. O. Codrington exhibited two Roman gold coins, lately discovered in India, of Lucius Verus and Sept. Severus respectively, the type of the latter being VIRTVS AVGVSTORVM, Sept. Severus riding between his two sons, Caracalla and Geta.—Mr. W. S. Churchill exhibited a rupee of Bhurtpore, with the head of Queen Victoria and a native legend.—Rev. C. Soames communicated a paper on a hoard of Roman bronze coins of the Constantine period recently discovered on Graham Hill, Marlborough. The coins range in date from Licinius I. to Constantius II.—Dr. B. V. Head read some extracts from an article by Sir A. Cunningham on the coins of the Sakas or Sace-Scythians.

STATISTICAL.—May 20.—Sir R. W. Rawson in the chair.—The paper read was 'The Position and Prospects of Industrial Conciliation,' by Mr. L. L. Price. The paper was, to some extent, a continuation of a previous paper read in December, 1886.—Messrs. Sydney Buxton, G. Howell, C. M. Norwood, S. B. Boulton, W. H. Hey, and the Chairman took part in the discussion that followed.

PHILOLOGICAL.—May 16.—Anniversary Meeting.—Rev. Dr. R. Morris, President, in the chair.—Prof. Liebmann, of Cape Town, was elected a Member.—The President read his report, with many amusing extracts, 'On the Progress of Pāli Literature and Philology from 1880 to 1890,' in continuation of his former report to the Society in 1880 on the same subject.—The following Members were elected officers for the ensuing year: President, H. Bradley; Vice-Presidents, Dr. Whitley Stokes, A. J. Ellis, Rev. Dr. R. Morris, Dr. H. Sweet, Dr. J. A. H. Murray, Prince L. L. Bonaparte, and Rev. Prof. W. W. Skeat; Ordinary Members of Council, E. L. Brandreth, Prof. T. de Lacouperie, F. T. Elworthy, Talfourd Ely, C. A. M. Fennell, H. Hucks Gibbs, T. Henderson, Prof. R. Martineau, Rev. J. B. Mayor, W. R. Morfill, Prof. Napier, Dr. J. Peile, T. G. Pinches, Prof. J. P. Postgate, Prof. C. Rieu, Rev. A. H. Sayce, Dr. E. B. Tylor, H. Wedgwood, Dr. R. F. Weymouth, and W. H. Wigdery; Treasurer, B. Dawson; Hon. Sec., Dr. F. J. Furnivall.

INSTITUTION OF CIVIL ENGINEERS.—May 20.—Sir J. Coode, President, in the chair.—It was announced that seven Associate Members had been transferred to the class of Members, and that nine Students had been admitted.—The last ballot of the session resulted in the election of three Members and of twenty-three Associate Members.—The paper read was 'On the Keswick Water-Power Electric-Light Station,' by Messrs. W. P. J. Fawcus and E. W. Cowan.

HISTORICAL.—May 15.—Mr. O. Browning in the chair.—The following were elected Fellows: The Bishop of Lichfield, Rev. W. H. Hutton, Rev. W. Potter, Prof. J. S. Elkington, Prof. S. R. Gardiner, Lieut.-General Sir G. Graham, Sir G. Grey, Messrs. N. Ball, G. B. Barton, F. A. Campbell, J. L. Currie, J. N. Figgis, H. Holloway, W. Marshall, C. W. C. Oman, and E. Tregear.—Mr. J. S. Stuart-Glennie read a paper 'On the Desirability of treating History as a Science of Origins.' After criticizing the literary view of history as presented by Mr. Carlyle and Mr. Froude, and defended by Mr. Birrell, Mr. Stuart-Glennie urged a scientific treatment of history on these three grounds: first, because a truthful description—truthful not merely in details, but truthful in the standpoint from which details are described—is possible only as a result of a scientific study of origins; secondly, because we have at length got such an accumulation of new facts, and, in the theory of evolution, such a fund of new ideas, as make it possible to treat great questions of historical origins with some assurance of the possibility of a scientific solution; and, thirdly, because of the more important practical consequences which would follow that better understanding of the modern revolution which is possible only through a solution of the larger historical problems.—A discussion followed, in which Prof. Rhys Davids, Dr. Heinemann, Mr. R. Lloyd, Mr. Nutt, Mr. J. F. Palmer, and the Chairman took part.

HUGUENOT.—May 14.—Annual General Meeting.—Sir H. A. Layard, President, in the chair.—The following were elected Fellows: The Earl of Rosebery, Col. T. P. Berthon, Messrs. D. Foudrinier, A. C. Margary, and B. Riviere, Mrs. B. Bruce, Mrs. C. Margary, and Mrs. W. Minet.—The report of the Council was read, announcing the preparation of several important genealogical works for the coming year; and the President delivered his annual address, with special allusion to the recent researches of the Huguenot Societies of America, France, Italy, and the Netherlands.—It was decided to hold the Society's summer conference on July 18th and 19th at Bristol.

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.

- TUES. Royal Institution, 8.—'The Natural History of Society,' Mr. A. Lang.
 — Photographic, 8.
 — Folk-lore, 8.—'Marriage Customs of the Morvians,' Hon. J. Abernethy.
 THURS. Royal Institution, 3.—'Fame and Explosives,' Prof. Dewar.
 FRI. United Service Institution, 3.—'Signalling between the Royal Navy and the Mercantile Marine,' Lieut. W. C. Cretcher.
 — Royal Institution, 9.—'Astronomical Telescope,' Mr. A. A. Comyn.
 SAT. Royal Institution, 3.—'Ballad Music of the West of England,' Rev. S. Spring Gould.
 — Botanic, 5½.—'Election of Fellows.'

Science Gossip.

MESSRS. CROSBY LOCKWOOD & SON will publish immediately a new "Pocket-Book" for electrical engineers, which has been written by Mr. H. R. Kempe, of the Postal Telegraphs Department. They have also nearly ready a new work on 'Electric Light Fitting,' a practical handbook for working electrical engineers, by Mr. John W. Urquhart, whose book on 'Electric Light' is well known. The same publishers have in the press a new elementary treatise on 'Light,' for the use of architectural students, by Mr. E. W. Tarn, forming a new volume of 'Weale's Rudimentary Series'; also a revised and enlarged edition of Prof. Merivale's 'Notes and Formulæ for Mining Students,' and a new edition of Mr. G. W. Usill's 'Practical Surveying.'

MR. DANIEL J. RANKIN, whose name is well known in connexion with the Zambesi and Nyassa countries, will contribute an article on 'The Portuguese in Makolololand' to the June number of Blackwood.

MR. CALEB PAMELY, M.E., of Pontypridd, has in the press a comprehensive treatise for the use of mining engineers, dealing with the whole subject of colliery working and management. It will be published by Messrs. Crosby Lockwood & Son.

MESSRS. SPON will in a week or two issue an elaborate work by Mr. J. S. Jeans on waterways and water transport, which will contain a description of the Suez, Panama, Nicaraguan, Manchester, and other canals. The work will fill some 500 pages, and will deal with the economic circumstances and the possibilities, as well as with the history of the principal waterways of the world.

FINE ARTS

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.—THE ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTIETH EXHIBITION IS NOW OPEN.—5, Pall Mall East, from 10 till 6.—Admission, 1s.; Catalogue, 1s.
 ALFRED D. FRITH, R.W.S., Secretary.

THE LEGEND of the BIAIR ROSE, painted by E. BURNE JONES, A.R.A.

THE LEGEND of the BIAIR ROSE.—The EXHIBITION of MR. BURNE JONES'S Four Pictures is NOW OPEN at Messrs. Thomas Agnew & Sons' Old Bond Street Galleries, 39, Old Bond Street, W.—Admission, 1s. 10 to 6 o'clock.

THE LEGEND of the BIAIR ROSE.—NOTICE. The Exhibition will NOT be open on Whit Monday, May 25th.—Thomas Agnew & Sons.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

(Third and Concluding Notice.)

HISTORICAL AND LEGENDARY PICTURES.

MR. A. C. GOW'S After Waterloo (No. 123) is one of the best military pictures we have seen in this country, where our painters seldom succeed with such themes, and decidedly the best work of the artist. The routed French race along the road from the stricken field; their Emperor is riding moodily in their midst. His staff watch his face as they hurry along; some of the horsemen look back athwart a wilderness of banners, lances, bayonets, and swords carried aloft by a torrent of men, the confusion of which attests the hurry and fear of the bearers as well as the skill of the designer. A sutler lashes her horse to his full speed, heedless of the cries of a soldier crushed beneath the cart-wheels. There are several good incidents among those on foot; for example, a young sous-officier of the Guard, who while still running binds up his wounded arm, holding the bandage with his teeth. Although the painting is here and there thin and slight, and the effect rather lacks force of light and shadow, the work as a whole is most excellent; while the arms, dresses, and accoutrements of the fugitives are cleverly and soundly painted, and the faces are very good indeed. — Returning from the Cherry Groves, Tokio (125), by Mr. T. Wores, is a dramatic illustration of Japanese customs. Here is a spirited design deftly carried out; but at the best the subject needed only a small canvas, and could have been efficiently illustrated by a woodcut.

—Mr. Herkomer is almost at his best as a painter in Our Village (143), a sort of bucolic idyll. There is something dramatic in the figures and the pathos of the landscape. It is worth a dozen interiors of the Charterhouse Chapel, such as the Academicians were unwise enough to buy with the Chantrey Fund from last year's exhibition. The scene is a street in a Hertfordshire village, near the parting of the ways, just after sundown has left the air aglow, and golden light flushes the church tower, the taller trees, and higher clouds. The old houses no less than the figures are well designed and grouped, and painted with warmth and just appreciation of effect, while the colour is good. Apart from this the picture contains nothing demanding a canvas more than an eighth the size of this one.

Mr. F. Dicksee's Redemption of Tannhäuser (203) is another canvas that is much too big for its subject and treatment, and besides it does not possess the vigour of the newly elected Academician's capital work. The heroine Elizabeth lies on a bier; to her appears, as on the stage, the hero Tannhäuser. The minor figures are well placed, but not more spontaneously and passionately designed than the leading ones. The well-ordered composition, genteel motives, smooth execution, and hackneyed pathos are not likely to move the spectator, or satisfy the critic that the painter had a call to treat an unpromising subject at all. Certainly there was no need to deal with it like a stage piece, performed by well-trained, but uninspired actors. —Mr. E. Crofts's Whitehall (216) professes to show how King Charles submitted himself to fate. As to the mode of this execution Mr. Crofts had no call to inform us, because in his picture the king has not yet "bowed his comely head." But the block is high, so that its victim must needs kneel before it, not lie down on the scaffold as Strafford undoubtedly did, and most probably the master who betrayed him. On this point let us say here that in contemporary woodcuts and in print ample evidence exists of the employment of both methods of decapitation. The evidence we have procured by considerable research is strongly opposed to the idea that a high block was used, but it is not quite conclusive against it; therefore let the painter have the benefit of the doubt. We cannot praise his design in general, which fails to treat the finest element of the subject, the king's behaviour, with anything like adequacy, but, on the contrary, makes the most of the armour, the buff coats, and weapons of the soldiery, who are placed in the foreground and are really more conspicuous than the occupants of the scaffold. This is the treatment of a spectacle, and the design is neither melodramatic in the best sense of that term, nor, as it ought to be, tragic. The badness of the architecture is simply atrocious, for which there is really no excuse, and there is a great deal of slovenly drawing and painting in every part of the picture; even the armour Mr. Crofts is so fond of is not thoroughly drawn, nor is the effect of light upon lustrous steel veraciously given; in fact, the shadows plainly suggest that it was painted indoors. It must be admitted that the artist has told his story cleverly in an ad captandum fashion, but he should not be content to produce spectacular pieces on easy terms. A few of the faces are deftly painted, but not one is solidly and learnedly drawn, searchingly modelled, or thought out—that is, designed—with sympathy and insight.

Among the most dramatic designs in the gallery, and yet not equal to his capital works which we admired here last season and this year in the Grosvenor Gallery, is Mr. F. Brangwyn's "All Hands shorten Sail!" (76), a telling, but somewhat depressing contribution by a painter who is fond of exciting our sympathy for the hardships of seamen. The picture before us would be more welcome if it were one-fourth its present size, which would amply suffice to depict rough weather, a turbid, furious sea, the half-swamped deck of a reeling ship, and men climbing the shrouds. Expressive and energetic as it is, the picture would gain much if its colouring were less clay-like and brighter, and the whole richer and deeper in tone.

To the "Onward!" (186) of Sir J. Gilbert we have already alluded. It is so admirable a piece of colour and so full of martial fire that the visitor may well forgive the loose draughtsmanship and questionable proportions of the horse and man, the mannerisms of the design and handling, as well as the impossible indoor shadows in an outdoor effect. These are Sir John's academical conventions, without which we cannot now have his art. It was not always so.—The Study in Red (237) of Mr. W. T. Dannat is a travesty of Impressionism. The red dress requires a good deal of mitigation and an increase of richness and beauty, while the woman's complexion must be much improved before this crude "study" becomes a harmony of any kind. We fail to see how that can be a "study" in colour which is not only inharmonious in tone, but likewise in tint. Nature's "studies" in tint and tone are invariably harmonious.—The facility with which studies made in the Life Schools can be converted into subject pictures is familiar to visitors at the Salon. It is easy to give a name to a nudity. There is a run upon 'Ishmael,' or 'L'Épave' has a turn, according as the background is a desert or a seashore. Mr. L. Scott's Ishmael (256) is by no means a bad study of an emaciated boy, nearly naked, asleep or dead upon a sandy desert.

Mr. Boughton is not at his best in The Puritans' first Winter in New England (396), a winter piece the technique of which shows how cheaply snow can be painted. The wintry sea compares ill with other pictures in this gallery of a stormy ocean and lowering skies, such as Mr. A. J. Hook's 'On the Lobster Ground' (700), or Mr. F. Brangwyn's "All Hands shorten Sail!" (76). 'The Birth of a Titan' (265), by Mr. W. L. Wyllie, and 'A Perilous Calling' (394) of Mr. N. Dawson. Is there any reason why Mr. Boughton should fail to paint the troubled sea as well as even the youngest and least famous of these gentlemen? In front of the Associate's picture two women, who seem to take the troubles of their companions very coolly, are walking homewards, and, although the weather is rough and bitterly cold, they have not neglected to wear their jewels and choice finery even in the most critical hour of the infant colony. The figures are, in short, dull and mannered, and the picture, which relies on a very hackneyed arrangement of pearly tones and tender colours, is the tritest of Mr. Boughton's commonplaces.

A Summer Night (487), by Mr. A. Moore, marks an effort, as considerable as it is honourable, on the part of one of our ablest artists to prove that he is capable of painting as well as ever. If he works thus ambitiously he will by-and-by deserve success greater than attends this picture of four semi-nude damsels imperfectly grouped, whose sculptural faces, isolated attitudes, and academical graces attest the influence of Greek statuary upon the artist. His notions of composition seldom rise above the principles of design inevitable in bas-relief. The figures are illuminated in an inexplicable manner, and from the front, but so that, although the illumination is bright, it casts no shadows to speak of—compare the shadows of the limbs and that of the Persian jar conspicuous in the foreground. The lighting of this interior is quite inconsistent with that of the landscape, against the brilliance of which the figures ought to stand out in much darker tones. Apart from this, Mr. Moore's work is remarkable for its style, the attitudes and easy grace of the girls, the beauty of their mannered faces, and the elevated types adopted throughout. The vermiculated flesh (due to coarse stippling) is a mistake in taste as well as in fidelity to nature; but the morbidezza at large of the nude forms inclines to the development of a fine style, which is very welcome at all times, and especially so when very different technical methods obtain popularity. The grace of the girls redeems the lack of composition in the picture and the bad arrangement of its dominating lines, which, it is evident, were never thought out by the artist. The picture is really an exercise in bright yellow, blue, and white, with the carnations, and such help as certain accessories of divers colours can afford to a fine and ambitious piece of decoration.—Another painting distinguished from its surroundings by an honourable effort to attain style is the Hon. J. Collier's Death of Cleopatra (551), in which the dead queen lies in profile on a bier placed at the feet of two gigantic statues of Memnon in black basalt, seated side by side in the half gloom of the temple palace, whose huge richly coloured columns rise on either hand. Effective as the design may be, it gives one the idea of a scene which has been carefully arranged to impress a spectator. Consequently it lacks spontaneity. There is much technical merit in the painting, and the whole has been carefully thought out. The figure of the attendant watching at the head of the bier is noteworthy for expression, aptness, draughtsmanship, and colour.

Very prettily designed is Mr. C. M. Hardie's An Unrecorded Coronation (599), a group of gaily clad children in a graveyard. The little ones are graceful and natural; there is good colour in the picture, and the effect of shadows dashed with sunlit gleams is true, bright, and homogeneous. The execution is less solid than we could wish, because in it much is made of a little labour, and the whole is not quite sound.—There are some well-designed groups in Mrs. Bannerman's Marlow Regatta Course (643), but the colour is a trifle dull. Still the results are gained by simple means, and the effect of light is natural.—Miss Logsdail's In a Library Corner (718) is part of the cathedral library at Lincoln, a panelled chamber of the seventeenth century. Though the shadows are a little black they are clear, in harmony with the light of the interior, and well studied throughout. Apart from the blackness this is a sincere and expressive painting. With it may be noticed the same lady's capital picture of the entrance to the same library, a solemn front of stone darkened by time and stained with smoke, and draped with autumnal creepers. The light, colour, and tone are exceedingly good and true, and in both pictures the artist's touch is firm and frank. The title is "Autumn laying here and there fiery Fingers on the Leaves" (1011).—Mr. L. J. Pott's The Jester's Story (769), an interior of an ancient chamber lined with oak, and furnished with what we now call bric-à-brac, comprises among its figures a fool in mediæval costume perched on a table, and with wild glee relating a story to a company of ladies in Italian costumes of the end of the sixteenth century. The design possesses spirit of a theatrical sort, but the artist's manner is less pleasing and successful than usual, although he is always clever. The flesh is coarsely modelled and bad in colour. Altogether the picture lacks refinement.—There is choice flesh painting, apt and good colour, in the somewhat flimsily handled and indefinite Bathers (788) of Mr. J. Moore. As a study in tone and light it is, for a sketch, first rate, and we accept it as an illustration of the effect of glowing light on flesh and its surroundings. Of course it is, therefore, only part of a picture.—A good example of tone, somewhat defective in colour, but noteworthy for the tender expression of the face of a young lady, is Mr. J. H. F. Bacon's Waiting for the Train (1016), which bears the motto "We leave our homes, but leave our hearts behind." The costume is common and less elegant than modern. The accessories deserved more attention, and the indigo dress is a little painty.—Nos. 1041, Ophelia, by Mrs. H. Rae, and 1049, Vashti Deposed, by Mr. E. Normand, hang as pendants to each other, and are far from being unlike; the former has the more fibre; each is a melodrama loosely painted, and not quite worthy of the artist. 'Ophelia' is in this respect the worse of the pair.—Mr. S. J. Solomon's Hippolyta captured (1063) is less violent and melodramatic in its passion than most of the painter's performances. There is some moderation and probability in the fierce movements of the rearing horses and the strong riders, whose life-size forms are seen in glowing sunlight. The colouring is bright and effective.—The Perseus and Andromeda (1076) of Mr. H. S. Tuke shows a ludicrously feeble conception of a noble subject, and the bad drawing and melodramatic motives are only too open to criticism. The ruddy faces and pale bodies betray the model, and belong to persons habitually clothed! The legs of Perseus are greatly in need of revision, while his manner of striking at the odd-looking fish which approaches in the waves is that of a schoolgirl unused to arms. It is a shadow of a picture, without colour, vigour, or tone of any kind.—Full of beautiful colour and tone, vigorous, and graceful, but not quite innocent of the theatre (for this the subject may be responsible), is M. Fantin-Latour's Première Scène du 'Rheingold' de R. Wagner (1109). The nymphs are disporting themselves in the richly toned light and shadow of the rocky bank above the Rhine, as they hover over the concealed treasure and glitter in the golden beams of sunlight slanting from above; the evil genius watches them from below. Of this artist's fine flower pieces we have yet to speak.—The Circe (1160) of Mr. E. Spence, a buxom girl in blue, with a pretty face, and Mr. J. Adamson's so-called Portrait of a Lady (1170) are unfavourably hung, and seem worthy of better places.—We cannot say so much for Mr. G. P. Jacob-Hood's unfortunate and flimsy picture The Witches' Dance (1166), which touches on the ridiculous when it should have been weird, if not terrible, and passionately grotesque. Mr. Jacob-Hood had a reputation which will hardly survive such pyrotechnics as this.

PORTRAITS IN OIL.

The number of portraits is not greater than usual, but they are generally above the average, and attest the continued development of a branch of art of which a few years since it was the fashion to lament the approaching extinction. At present not only are hosts of good portraits produced, but prices are given for them far greater than Reynolds, Gainsborough, or Romney dared to hope for. We may mention the best of them. Miss J. Story's M. Phillips, Esq. (44), a whole-length, life-size figure in a blue coat, is harsh and dry in the painting, but brimful of character; a masculine work that varnishing will improve.—Mr. Ouless's A. Holden, Esq. (74), a capital likeness, is vigorous and characteristic, but his Sir D. A. Smith (80), a far more difficult subject, is a better picture. We do not care much for the Bishop of St. Albans (117), but the Bishop of Chichester (197) is one of Mr. Ouless's best heads, although the flesh shadows are rather too hot, and are also dark. The treatment is very broad and good.—Mr. W. B. Richmond's Bishop of Durham (124) has a self-conscious air, and fixes his gaze on us in a way which the painter might as well have avoided because it seems neither spontaneous nor sincere. A clever picture, it hardly bears looking into so well as most of Mr. Richmond's have done. Always happier with portraits of ladies than with those of men, he is at his best in the graceful and elegant Countess of Yarborough (449), a life-size, whole-length, seated figure in a dress of white over yellow. The colour is gay, the expression and gesture are animated, and the lady's beauty has been represented with taste. The picture would probably suffer from closer examination.—Mr. W. R. Symonds's Wm. Travers, Esq. (132), is decidedly good and sincere.—Sir E. H. Currie (144) is the best portrait we know by Mr. Pettie: a seated, three-quarters-length figure, of which the face is enriched by the sitter's sense of humour and the artist's tact in reproducing its expression, while the whole is full of life and character, and less marred than usual by Mr. Pettie's unlucky partiality for introducing yellow into the complexions of his subjects (who all look as if they had been suffering from jaundice), and making their skins too red. In his Sir R. Dixon (1099), which is characteristic of the subject, the crudeness and unmitigated redness of the uniform is a great defect.—Compare this with the fine redness of the coat in Mr. A. S. Cope's T. Brooks, Esq., its pendant, No. 1091, of which the face also is first rate.

Mr. G. F. Watts is characteristically fortunate in Hester Fraser Tytler (196), a charming likeness of a little girl dressed in white: an admirable piece of colour and a rich soft effect.—Mr. Wells is exceptionally happy in Mrs. T. Johnson (211), at life size, in black and crimson. The erect and animated pose must be true to the life, and as characteristic as it is happy. Few ladies' portraits here are so good as this one, and none is better. Lilla (284), by the same artist, a slender girl in grey, with a gentle face and ingenuous air, is likewise creditable to the painter and above his standard, especially in respect to its colour. Mrs. C. Wylie (359), a life-size, whole-length, seated figure, is original. The colour is good, but the painting is rather heavy, and it is by no means Mr. Wells's best work.—The Portraits (235) of Mr. W. Q. Orchardson are well grouped in an interior, and the expressions, so far as they exist, are good; but the shadows are hot even for Mr. Orchardson, and the work is thin and empty. J. C. Stevenson, Esq. (367), is, though from its thinness and lack of impasto more like a piece of stained glass than a painting in oil, a capital instance of characterization, brightly painted and deftly handled throughout; but its coloration and chiaroscuro being scattered, the effect at large is spotty.—"La Belle Américaine," a Portrait (292), is one of Mr. P. R. Morris's brightest and least vulgar efforts, the life-size, whole-length figure of a lurid, somewhat passion-worn and meretricious beauty, dressed from head to foot in pale purple satin, which is strongly lighted from below, and, apart from the pyrotechnic look of the whole, which is offensive, no unapt representation. This artist's other portraits are not conspicuously excellent, but they are decidedly better than the fat babies and over-dressed adults he has often given us.—Mrs. F. Goodall (296), by her husband, a life-size, three-quarters-length figure, turned to our left, dressed in black and red against a green background, is a little hard, but otherwise an excellent picture, and evidently like life. Sir O. Clayton (463), life size, seated, is a serviceable likeness, and well studied.

There is not a finer portrait here than Mr. Herkomer's Major E. R. Burke (318). Broad, powerful, animated, frankly and yet searchingly touched, and full of character, this work deserves its honourable place in Gallery III. It is better than Mrs. A. Sassoon (411), by the same artist, a slighter but not less brilliant work, which is notable for the rosy, opalescent lines of the dress and their harmony with the warm complexion. The first impression of this capital picture is most favourable, but it does not grow upon us. The head is expressive and life-like; the painting of the flesh is thin and rather poor. Miss Vlasto (502) has similar qualities to those of the last. The arms are badly drawn, but the colour is pleasing.—Mr. W. H. Margetson's T. F. Franklin, Esq. (350), has a good subject, painted in a masculine manner.—W. E. Gladstone, Esq., and his Grandson (361) has injured Sir J. E. Millais's reputation, and ought not to have been exhibited in a state only to be accounted for by the shortness of the sittings given to the artist. It improves on acquaintance, although its imperfections—such as hasty draughtsmanship, undeveloped forms, flatness, slightness, and lack of colour—are obvious. In one respect it is to be preferred to many portraits of the statesman—there is no attitudinizing, and the face is neither menacing nor dictatorial, as it usually is in Mr. Gladstone's portraits.—In Mr. H. Baldry's Lady Carew (385) the pose is sentimental, but the face is good, and the draperies are well painted.—Mr. J. S. Sargent's Portrait of a Lady (421) is incomparably better than a deplorable caricature of Mrs. Comyns Carr which is at the New Gallery. Still the charm of its colour and brilliant breadth, the apt reading of a quaint expression on the features (which we must have seen before), although fine qualities, must not blind us to the slovenly execution and empty forms of the picture. Mrs. K. (652), by the same artist, ought not to be overlooked by students of character and colour.—The cruel look, frosty complexion, and constrained artificial air of Earl Granville (508) in Mr. D. A. Wehrschmidt's portrait are unfortunate for the able painter, whose work has a rough and too dry surface.—We are sorry for Master Gordon Ness if his eyes and skin resemble those of Mr. Colin Hunter's portrait (694). We do not believe the poor child's legs or his hands can be in the state Mr. Hunter has represented; his very clothing is incredible.—The Daughters of Mr. J. F. Haworth, by Mr. A. T. Nowell, No. 783, hangs so high that we can only speak of the ingenuous and sincere expressions, the evidently faithful portraiture, the bright and clear complexions, the dresses (which are too dark for harmony), and the general brightness of the work. The rhododendrons behind the figures form a good background, and the picture is most artistic.

The Henri Rochefort (879) of M. Jan van Beers is a small half-length figure. The dense white hair bristling against the light gives a curiously wild and uncanny look to a face by no means prepossessing or comely. There is an elfish expression in the eyes, and more than a trace of cynicism in the mouth. The clever modelling, just feeling for the effect of light, and the researchful touch of the painter are manifest here almost as much as in the neighbouring picture of a lady called 'A Smile' (886), which we noticed last week.—The Prince Giglio (1193), by Mr. E. J. Gregory, has more portraiture than poetry in the solid, finely drawn and modelled head in armour, No. 1193, in the Water-Colour Room. It is bright, firm, and masculine.—Near it is Mr. E. Wauters's highly accomplished head of M. H. Spielmann, Esq. (1195), an animated likeness very deftly rendered.

THE MINIATURES.

They were false prophets who foretold the extinction of miniature painting by photography. There are in the Academy 130 miniatures as good as were ever painted in this country. Among them are Miss J. Gibson's Miss K. S. Beaton (1438); Miss M. Mansell's Miss J. Hyde-Parker (1442); Miss J. Holloway's Daughter of R. Combe, Esq. (1444); Mr. R. Henderson's Master F. Holland (1456) and Mrs. C. M. Agnew (1458); Miss A. Hunter's Miss B. Hunter (1470); Lord Bennet's J. M. Richardson, Esq. (1474); Miss A. Howard's

Children of Col. and Mrs. Harford (1531); Mr. C. Johnson's Miss H. (1539); Mr. E. Taylor's Daughter of Sir U. K. Shuttleworth (1556); and other capital instances by Mr. C. Turrell and Mr. E. R. Hughes.

THE LANDSCAPES.

Having already dealt with nearly all the leading landscapes in this exhibition, we shall offer running comments on the best of those we have not mentioned, noticing along with them the flower pictures and some "landscapes with figures" which are not, like some of the pictures we have already criticized, "figures with landscapes." Bare trees, faded rushes, dark water, and a wintry sky, the whole in true keeping, form a capital landscape in Mr. A. F. W. Hayward's November on the Helen (17). The sentiment is sincere.—The Eventide (21) of Mr. S. Pike is warm, soft, and true. With this may be bracketed Mr. T. T. Rowe's End of the Day (23), a well-graded view of a smooth canal; the effect is that of the time "between the sun and moon." It is a broad and rich landscape.—Mr. A. A. Glendening's Lustleigh Cleave (29) is a little spotty here and there; but the local colours are bright and clear, and a fine moorland valley is depicted with exemplary truth.—The White Mill (43) of Mr. D. Murray charms us with its nacreous distance, good sky, and coloration at large; but it is not one of his best works. The honour of being so belongs to In Summer-Time (875), a lovely little landscape in Gallery IX. When we say that the air, foreground, and middle distance are worthy of David Cox's best time, what more is there to say of so fine, rich, and brilliant a picture? The Young Wheat (1090), by the same artist, is most beautiful. Indeed, the three pictures all of them show the great improvement made by a painter who used to be in too great a hurry, and did not always paint his best.—We admire the breadth and sentiment, the good colour and rich tones of Mr. C. H. H. Macartney's Moorland (57), but we regret the harshness of its hastily-painted sky.—Mr. W. Hunt has done well in A Bright November Day (95), a capital piece of nature; and the River Folk (97) of Mr. P. Tarrant, a girl and children in a punt, although it is painted in a hard manner, like a mosaic, and spotty, is bright and well designed.

The landscapes of Mr. B. W. Leader do not grow upon the student of nature, because they are inspired by the tritest of motives. The sentiment is of the cheapest kind, and they are dreadfully painty. The Sandy Margin of the Sea (131) is paint disguised by ready-made sentiment, and no part of it bears examination any better than one of Mr. P. Graham's clouds, or rocks, or waves. Where Sea and River Meet (458) is another apt example of Mr. Leader's shallow manner; while The Silent Evening Hour (672) is a complete specimen of cheap execution, threadbare sentiment, and paintiness. A sort of machine-made landscape art is fully illustrated by such picture-making made easy as Mr. Leader's. His works, if they can be called works, form a strong contrast to the brilliant and harmonious colouring and dignified original sentiment of Mr. W. A. Mackworth's Cloud Chariots (156). The noble idea and choice colouring displayed in this picture should have been carried out with greater finish. So good a work deserves its distinguished place.—Mr. A. Stokes's Off St. Ives (137) depicts with charming colour, tone, and light the sea breaking in the foreground, a shallow shore, dark-sailed craft passing onwards to the night fishing, and clouds floating aloft in a sky of pale gold fading into evening. It is a beautiful and sympathetic study of nature in an admirable style.—We like the sympathetic rendering in Mr. W. G. Foster's Lingering Light (161) of the full moon rising over high cliffs, purple sands, and a calm blue sea. The group of lilies in front tells as colour, but they are not substantial, as in nature. The difficult effect has been finely studied. The Even- ing (168) of Mr. F. W. Jackson has the sentiment of the landscape chosen and of the time represented; but otherwise it is a Mason and paint.

A fine group of land and sea scenes comes next. In No. 217, "Out into the West as the Sun went down," a fishing boat leaving harbour, Mr. J. Fraser has employed choice and simple means to delineate a most brilliant and beautiful effect. The glowing light is justly harmonized, and there is a great deal of poetry in the work.—Mr. M. R. Corbett is at his best in "A Land of Fragrance, Quietness, and Trees and Flowers" (233). It is a noble piece, but it has been hung above the line, while a score of coarsely painted commonplace landscapes are on the line, although not contributed by Academicians. Mr. Corbett's picture is noteworthy for its reposeful air, a serene glow, and noble simplicity, but the motto from Keats is unsuited to it.—Two most original pictures by Mr. F. Brangwyn deserved better places, although they are not ill seen. They are Outward Bound (241) and "Stand by!" (248), which represent the "behaviour" of a broad-chested and fussy tug at work on a heavily rolling sea. In the former she is ahead of the laden ship, whose sails are just filled by the wind; the tow-line has been hauled on board and all is made right. In the latter the pilot, from a row-boat, hauls the tug, which is rising on a huge green wave that sweeps along without a crest; the steam roars hoarsely from the funnel, and the smoke is beaten down by the biting wind. The ship is cast off and left to make her way upon the lonely deep. All these elements have been most happily and sympathetically treated by Mr. Brangwyn. His work may be praised for its good colour, truth, keeping, and uncommon simplicity and breadth. We have already noticed his capital "All Hands shorten Sail!" (76), and now call attention to his drawing A Stranger (1210).—The brilliant Idwal's Glory (244) is most creditable to Mr. A. J. Black, who has painted Cader Idris covered with snow, its crest flushed with the sun, and its hollow half filled with mist that gathers only to be blown away. It is a landscape full of dignity.—The Repose of Slanting Rays (255) we owe to Mr. J. Fullwood. It depicts, with much sentiment, good colour, and a little paint, the effect of late autumnal twilight, and a nacreous sky reflected by smooth water. We like The Grove (1643), by the same artist.—By an unfortunate mistake our notice of Mr. W. L. Wyllie's noble 'Birth of a Titan' (265) was, on p. 572, col. 2, ante, made to apply to his admirable 'H.M.S. Exmouth' (1615), in the Black and White Room, with which it has nothing whatever to do. In the former, to which we now come, a huge ironclad ram has just been launched, with all her flags flying, into the greenish olive and silvery grey of the Medway at Sheerness. It is a beautiful piece of drawing, and vigorous, choice, and harmonious colour; the black hulls of the busy tugs tell in the scheme of colour along with the pearly sky and warm, half-smoky, half-misty air. No. 1615 is an equally fine, but totally different instance, in another mode of art, and gives, in black and white, the dignity, solidity, and fine form of a big ship. No one ought to overlook this artist's Veere, a Dead City (1635), and The Upper Pool, London Bridge (1636), which are extremely fine.

Mr. MacWhirter's Glimpse of Loch Katrine (271) differs in no respect from many similar specimens of his mannered mood. His Old Sherwood (279) is a pendant to the last in nearly all technical qualities. Far finer and more artistic is his Mount Etna, from the Greek Theatre, Taormina (708). The sentiment of the place survives in this capital piece of colour and air, which, although not without a suspicion of paint, is as broad and soft as it is luminous.—Mr. Peppercorn's Evening (283) and his The Stream (289) are both good and poetic renderings of twilight on differing landscapes.—The Pontine Marshes (326), by Miss M. F. Drage, one of many similar plagiarisms, is a fairly successful reflection of M. Costa's art.—We must now notice (see p. 572, col. 3) Mr. J. Brett's Summer Shower (345), which is full of characteristic brilliancy. By the same artist is Mist off the Sea (962), a glowing seascape, where vapours slowly pass along the surface, and have already half enshrouded the remoter headlands. A yacht's white sail gleams in the distance. We admire the sand pools, the creeping tide, the true perspective of the air saturated with sunlight, and the able treatment of the resplendent levels of the sea.—Mr. F. Walton's landscape, No. 352, is poor, flat, and thin.

Mr. F. Goodall has before now proved himself a painter of surprises, but he never did so more truly than in The Thames, from Windsor Castle (366), which shows that he has found his vocation in landscape. It is a slightly cold, but solid and expressive panorama, soft and broad in effect, and highly harmonious in tone.—Mr. C. Hunter's Hills of Morven (384) is a coarsely effective and vulgarly sympathetic rendering of a noble, but somewhat melodramatic subject, in which a seascape is combined with a landscape and a cloudscape. There is a great deal of paint.—With No. 384, although it has nothing of its vigour, may be grouped Mr. V. Cole's Thames at Greenwich (390), a tame version of a fine subject. The Meeting of the Thame and Isis at Dorchester (234) is better painted, but not more masculine or fresh.—Masculine and fresh are epithets that apply to Mr. N. Dawson's A Perilous Calling (394), a Scarborough fishing boat gliding to a rough sea from a calm harbour, under a splendid moonlight contrasting with the deep gloom of the cliff-shadows. The glow and colour of the sea are delineated with great force and sense of nature; the movement of the vessel is first rate, and while the effect is extremely vivid, the whole is in a large and simple style, delightful to artistic eyes.—Mr. W. Pye's Valley of the Swir (494), a panorama of a flat country, the river, and distant hills, is most effective and broad.

Mr. H. Wilkinson's Calm Day on the Coast (514) is a powerful study of dark purple slate cliffs, a little cove, and the sea in a white calm.—We can praise the breadth and colouring of Miss U. Wood's Morning (515).—The charm of a well-felt effect is recognizable in Mr. J. Aumonier's The Silver Lining of the Cloud (524).—Mr. A. T. Nowell's Lucerne (554) does not improve on acquaintance; the sky is but half finished, painty, and flat.—The Windsor Castle (584) of Mr. W. Fitz is good and simple, in a low key.—Mr. A. Priestman's Silvery Morning on the Devon Coast (639) is a capital study of broad shadowless light on an expanse of dunes.—Clearness, vigour, and dignified sentiment distinguish the Earl of Carlisle's Sacred Lake, Karnac (664), a desert pool at the foot of gigantic ruins. It is austere without harshness.—Effective and rich in colour is Mr. C. E. Johnson's The Last Light (687), a moorland landscape; but it is a little heavy.—Mr. A. Hook's best picture is On the Lobster Ground (700), a Penzance fishing boat riding at her anchor in a fresh breeze, while the crew lift the lobster pots. The sound modelling of the waves, their true local colour, and the motion of the boat are the strong points of the picture.—Mr. E. Ellis's After a Three Days' Gale (710) is rich in colour.—Reminding us of M. Harpignies, Mr. A. Parsons in his Bend of the Avon (715) depicts a calm stream flowing bright and pure past a marly bank and between brilliant yet soft green meadows, in fine autumnal light: a charming picture full of tender colour. His Wild Marjoram (1268), in the Water-Colour Room, ought to be noticed.—The Perseus and Andromeda (737) of Mr. Bryan Hook is very spirited in design, and represents sunlight justly. A better picture by Mr. Hook is Thistle-Finches (951). The effect of soft air and the sheen upon the sea are wonderfully well given here. Although the water is a little rough and painty, the whole is broad in light and rich in colour.

One of the most brilliant and artistic studies of light and colour in landscape is the powerful and original Tulip Culture (750) of Mr. G. Hitchcock. Intense sunlight glows upon beds of various colours that are shut in by rows of spindling trees relieved with rare skill against the sky.—By the Linn Pool (759), by Mr. R. Noble, illustrates a conventional mode of treatment which is remarkable here. It is rich in dignity and expression, and in its non-naturalism contrasts strangely with the vivid 'Tulip Culture.' The shadows are intensely hot.—The Fisherman's Home (775) of Mr. C. H. M. Kerr is broad and bright. The colour is excellent, and the clear blueness of the foreground shadow is true to nature.—November Solitude (779), by Mr. W. Picknell, is very broad, fine, and rich in colour, simple and dignified in sentiment.—"The angry Sunset fades from out the West" (781), by Mr. R. Jobling, is a little painty and heavy in touch, but poetical and strong; the atmosphere is well studied.—A Worcestershire Hop Garden (805), by Mr. W. Urwick, shows just appreciation of the "qualities" and greys, and is so good and true in its feeling for colour and the composition of the figures that its surface deserves to be refined and the whole carried further.—Mr. W. Llewellyn's River Camel at Padstow (830), a capital picture of calm bright weather, may be praised for its tender colour and broad, soft effect. Similar qualities characterize the very different subject and picture of Mr. F. Whitehead, called A Frosty Morning (846).—The Off to the Fishing Ground (865) of Mr. J. C. U' Ren delineates with spirit a good sea in windy weather.—The Near Littlehampton (876) of Mr. A. Evershed is a little hard, but its brightness and pure colour are enjoyable. More research and refinement of tone would make it less painty.—Mr. C. G. Morris's Evening, Cornwall (911), a rough meadow near the sea, is a rough picture, but bright and rich in tone and tint.—The Wet Weather (956) of Mr. C. G. Grundy is a true and picturesque effect sympathetically rendered.—Wild Duck (960), by Mr. G. E. Lodge, a solid picture of the sea's edge, is commendable for its colour and naturalness. With this may be grouped another of the few good animal pictures of the year: Mr. J. M. Swan's Lioness defending her Cubs (614), a vigorous work, if not quite equal to his large work at the Grosvenor Gallery. The design is full of passion and very expressive; but the handling is somewhat loose, if not carelessly—"masterly."—Bright and full of colour, justly graded in tone, is Mr. C. P. Knight's Travellers waiting for the Evening Wind (1033), one of the finest pieces of painting of a calm sea in the Academy, and admirably drawn.—Writing last week of Mr. C. Hayes's Three Miles to the Fair (1042), we should have said that the gipsies are painfully trudging along a snowy road, not encamping on it.—Mr. D. Farquharson's April Morning (1067), Mr. J. H. Graham's Twilight Moon (1068), and Mr. H. J. Kinnaird's Thames Backwater (1070) treat general effects of nature with more sympathy and dexterity than research. The first is the artist's best picture; the second is exceptionally broad and rich.

M. Fantin-Latour's Chrysanthèmes d'Été (13) is pure and brilliant as painted flowers ought to be. The colours are most tenderly harmonized. His Roses Trémières (35) combines beautiful hues, a touch as crisp and fine, and the charms of light as true as in No. 13. No. 651, Roses, red, white, and yellow, in a bowl, gives textures to the life, and verisimilitude so great as to suggest the scent of the flowers. The colour is massive.

DRAWINGS IN WATER COLOURS.

These examples are as a whole admirable, full of merit and beauty, richer in studies, and more varied in subject and treatment, than those in the exhibition of the Old Society. In displaying them so well the Academy is effectually recognizing the art they represent. The claims of water-colour draughtsmen to Academical honours are often passionately urged, but it must be admitted that only a very few of the figure paintings in water colour give their authors the least right to such distinctions, and the landscapes, lovely as not a few of them are, are not so good as many oil pictures of the same class which have not yet brought to the artists the much-talked-of honours. Of course everybody knows that the water-colour societies have not, as such, the least desire to be extinguished by absorption in the Royal Academy. The Proposal (1175), white cockatoos whispering love matters, by Mr. H. S. Marks, differs only in its thinness and flatness of modelling from other capital pieces of humour by the same painter.—Of two fine drawings by Mr. G. Cockram, "Where the Sky dipt down to Sea and Sands" (1179) is the better.—Mr. L. Rivers's Evening (1188), a tranquil effect on old houses by the roadside, is most noble and pathetic, and technically broad, sober, and serene.—The Little Orme's Head (1213), by Mr. J. Finnie, is a little spotty, but it shows a large style, and the draughtsmanship of the boulders in the foreground is particularly excellent.—Miss E. J. Barrow's Azaleas, in a copper pot (1215), though a little cold and sculpture-like, is admirably drawn and soundly painted.—Mr. F. T. Sibley has produced a fine and tragic drawing, full of sympathy and grandeur, in his striking picture of a blood-red sunset over a dark calm sea and a wilderness of rocks left bare by the tide, called A Lonely Shore (1220).—An Old Quarry (1222) of Mr. E. E. Briggs is well studied, pure, broad, masculine, and solid.—The Silent Pool above the Dam (1221), by Mr. A. O. Townsend, is broad, soft, and rich in colour, a capital example.—The study of a cottage room with figures which Mr. H. G. Massey calls Bad News (1223) is excellent in a fine and sincere way.—Mr. A. M. Swan's roses in Our Lady of Roses (1226) are notable for the softness and tender breadth of colouring and the charm of homogeneity.—Mr. C. A. Smith's girl in a white dress before a fireplace, No. 1250, is careful, and evinces a fine sense of colour.—In An Angelsea Bulwark (1255), by Mr. P. Ghent, the drawing is masculine, solid, and powerful.—Broad and sober, full of air and colour, is Mr. F. Davis's Milford Heath (1260).—A Shower (1263), by Mr. A. F. Grace, pleases us by its beautiful tones and natural effect.

Among the few first-rate figure subjects in this room the "Twixt Hope and Fear" (1302) of Mr. R. Barber is pre-eminent in being the nearly life-size figure of a damsel in white, clasping one hand with the other. Her face is marked by intense anxiety on the trembling eyelids, the fixed eyes, and the beautiful mouth. In solid and pure draughtsmanship, under which we include the admirable drawing and modelling of the features of a choice type, few specimens here or elsewhere excel this work. The design is sincere and noble. The foreshortening of the left arm, though not quite successful, shows an energetic effort to make it so.—A strong drawing, but rather hot, is Mr. C. Richardson's Patterdale (1303).—In addition to these, and commendable in a more or less degree, are the following, which space compels us to mention briefly: Mr. J. W. West's A Cabstand (1309); Mr. J. Sowden's Robin Hood's Bay (1318), a strong instance of fine work and rare foreshortening; Mr. W. F. Bishop's "The Wood with Morning Sunlight Crowned" (1319); "Softly the Evening Mists Arise" (1324), by Mr. B. Cooper; A Visit to Wardour Street (1328), by Mr. B. W. Spiers, which is as precise as before, and rather less hard; Evening Stillness (1349), a sober and Rembrandtish drawing of high quality, which the Council has wisely bought with the Chantrey Fund, by Mr. R. B. Nisbet; The Last of the Ebb (1372), by Mr. H. E. James; Near Aber (1404), by Mr. J. Sutton; Chaffinches (1406), by Mr. C. Baldwin; Expectant (1426), by Mrs. L. J. Price; and the charmingly ingenious and bright Girl's Head (1432), by Miss K. Greenaway.

THE BLACK AND WHITE ROOM.

We must restrict our notice of the following prints and drawings to their bare names. Some of them have already been commended at length in these columns under "New Prints": Post Horses (1574), after M. Meissonier, by M. L. Monzier; The Rose of all the Roses, after Mr. Alma Tadema, by Mr. Lowenstam (1575); House at Hampstead (1577), after Constable, by Mr. H. R. Robertson; Sweet Roses (1579), after Mr. J. H. Lorimer, by Mr. R. W. Allan; Fladbury Ferry (1586), after Mr. A. Parsons, by Mr. F. Huth; Autumn (1589), after F. Walker, and Christmas Eve, after Sir J. E. Millais (1609), by Mr. R. W. Macbeth; Portrait of a Lady with a Fan (1593), after Rembrandt, by Herr P. J. Arendseer; A Hopeless Dawn (1595), after Mr. F. Bramley, by Mr. J. Dobie; Evening (1604), after Mr. A. Lemon, by Mr. H. W. Batley; Low Tide (1632), by Mr. F. Short; Original Mezzotint (1633), by Mr. J. Finnie; Study of an Acuba (1646), by Mr. A. G. Temple; Passion Flowers (1676), by Mr. A. Wasse; At the Riviera (1685), after Mr. G. H. Boughton, by Mr. W. Heydemann; The Countess of Mansfield (1679), after Romney, and Innocence (1699), after Greuze, by Mr. T. G. Appleton; The Swannery invaded by Eagles (1702), after Landseer, by Mr. J. B. Pratt; and Earl Spencer (1709), after F. Holl, by Mr. G. Robinson.

THE SCULPTURES.

The fine, solid, and elaborate modelling of Mr. F. J. Williamson's Hypatia at the altar (1945), a nudity of energetic design, which is much better fitted to represent Boadicea, recommends the work to all who know "the life."—Mr. A. Lanz's Pestalozzi (1946), a group of an old man and two children, is pretty and correct.—The Danaide (1949) of M. V. Bissen is elegant, the drapery is good, and the expression is of the right sort.—Mr. A. B. Joy's The late Lord Farnborough (1951) seems to us his best work; it is capably modelled, and the characterization is excellent. His Marquis of Salisbury (2024), a good likeness, is careful and smooth.—The Murmur of the Shell (1953), by Mr. C. MacBride, has a pretty air and face.—Mr. J. H. Thomas's The late Right Hon. W. E. Forster (1962), for Bradford, a life-size figure in bronze, is an excellent design, but it is a little rough.—Miss E. M. Moore's Watching a Head (1976), is original, expressive, and pathetic.—Miss I. C. Hardy's Study of a Giraffe (1978) is capably modelled and spirited.—Mr. T. N. MacLean's Robert Burns (1983), a bust, is a good likeness, well modelled in a broad style.—Mr. E. M. Rope's Design of Children (1985), moving in a circle, is a very pretty group in low relief.—Miss M. Grant's R. Hunt, Esq. (1994), has lifelike expression and much character.—Miss A. Thornycroft's My Mother (2000) is a decidedly pleasing and graceful bust.—Mr. A. Toft's George Wallis (2001) is true and animated.—Mr. C. Lawes's Figures (2004), grouped in a decorative and effective manner in high relief, shows much technical ability, but the design is confused and confusing, and illustrates the vices of the French School of the seventeenth century.—A Portrait Bust (2005), by Miss K. Bannin, has a pure and gentle expression.—Mr. H. H. Armstead's life-size statues of the Evangelists and Our Lord as the Good Shepherd (2046-2050) are serious pieces of work; the designs are varied and vigorous, while the modelling is scholarly and worthy of the artist. The Guardian Angel (2063), by the same, is touching.—Mr. H. Thornycroft sends in The Mirror (2057) his diploma work, a young mother playing with her child, a graceful design choicely modelled.—In Mr. H. R. Pinker's Sir W. Savory (2059) the flesh is capital and the face expressive.—Mr. H. Bates's Design for an Altar (2061) is in a severe monumental style.—The Dionysus (2080) of Mr. F. Pomeroy is a slender youth holding a rhyton on high, and charms the visitor by its apt motive and good style.—Mr. R. Rodgers's Study of a Head (2087), a "square," masculine, and vigorous work, is original.—The important statues of Messrs. Onslow Ford and F. Bates have already been admired in these columns, as has Mr. Woolner's sole contribution, the bust of Sir T. Elder (2079).

THE ARCHITECTURAL DRAWINGS.

These works exhibit qualities and characteristics differing very slightly, if at all, from their forerunners in the same place. They do not represent the present state of architecture in anything like an adequate degree; nor do they fully and fairly illustrate the modern applications of art, decorative and pictorial, to the service of their graver sister. Among the best are Mr. G. Aitchison's Bedroom (1716) and Bedroom (1744); Mr. H. H. Statham's Elevation (1720); Mr. Brewer's Catholic Church (1722); Mr. L. Stokes's Corpus Christi Priory (1729); Mr. B. Champneys's Offices (1760) and Stonehills (1857); Mr. Pearson's Sidney Sussex College (1771 and 1788); Mr. J. Sedding's New Church (1777); Mr. Bodley's Interior of St. Mary's, Clumber (1780 and 1846); Mr. T. G. Jackson's Brasenose College (1794); Mr. A. E. Street's Interior of Halifax Cathedral (1813); Mr. R. W. Edis's Junior Constitutional Club (1822); Messrs. J. T. Micklethwaite and S. Clarke's Church House at Westminster (1863); and Sir A. W. Blomfield's version of his own design for the same purpose, No. 1889.

Fine-Art Cossip.

It may be interesting to those who study such details, that Wilkie's 'Distraint for Rent,' which was sold on the 12th inst. for 2,310*l.*, brought 600 guineas to the painter in 1815 from the Directors of the British Institution, who in 1822 resold it for the same sum to Abraham Raimbach, who engraved it. At Mr. W. Wells's sale in 1848 it fetched 1,050*l.* 'The Jew's Harp,' sold on the 12th for 446*l.*, brought to Wilkie from Mr. F. Annesley 25 guineas. 'The Village Festival,' sold as above for 1,890*l.*, is not the picture Mr. Angerstein gave Wilkie 800 guineas for, and which is now in the National Gallery; it is the "sketch" for that work, and belonged to Lord Mulgrave, at whose sale in 1832 it realized 121*l.* 16*s.*

OUR readers will remember that some time ago a protest was made against the proposed destruction of the curious eighteenth century window in the north gable of Westminster Abbey to make way for a new one of Mr. Pearson's, and a sort of promise was made that the old glass should be replaced. The new window is now uncovered, and the glass, or at least some of it, in a mangled state is in it. We propose to return to the subject when the whole can be seen, and now only note that the figures of the apostles have been cut short at the knees to make them fit Mr. Pearson's tracery. This is "restoration."

MESSRS. CASSELL & Co.'s eighth annual exhibition of original drawings in black and white will be opened on the 5th of June at the Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street. The exhibition will include original drawings by Mr. W. F. Yeames, Mr. J. E. Hodgson, Mr. J.

MacWhirter, Mr. Blair Leighton, Miss Gow, and other artists.

At Mr. A. Collie's, 39b, Old Bond Street, may be seen bronze statuettes reproducing Sir F. Leighton's 'Sluggard'; 'Peace,' by Mr. O. Ford, and other sculptures. Mr. W. J. Stacey has issued invitations to view pictures in water colours by Mr. N. Dawson, and other paintings.

THE portrait-piece referred to last week as having been added to the National Gallery is now numbered 1305, and named "Portrait of Jan van Hemsbeeck and his Wife, Marie Koeck, painted in 1636 by G. Donck. Born, 16—; Died, 16—."

THE eighth annual meeting of the Society for Preserving Memorials of the Dead will be held on Saturday next, at 2 p.m., in the parish school-room, Lambeth, near the church. The parish church will be visited, when the rector will read a paper on 'The Monuments in the Church.' A visit to Lambeth Palace will follow.

PROF. RAMSAY and Mr. Hogarth have started this week on an archaeological tour in Asia Minor. Prof. Euting has returned from his expedition to Mesopotamia.

DR. ORSI has now terminated his work at Locri, in Magna Græcia, by the thorough examination of the heaps of broken terra-cottas, which appear to be as old as the original prehistoric temple. Two distinct groups of them were found outside the ancient city, and in part heaped against its walls, at the distance of about 300 metres from the Hellenic temple. The first heap occupied an area of about 50 by 35 metres, and herein were found small vases (for the most part rude), some patere, some small skyphoi (decorated simply with black bands and with triglyphs round the rim), and some moderate-sized hydria, but of rude construction. Some architectural ornaments made with a mould were also found, some having their reliefs touched with colour, and a large number of votive figurini, which crumbled into clay from long exposure to the moisture. When entire some of the latter may have been nearly two feet high, and the character they present is altogether archaic, based on hieratic motives, as in the ancient style. The greater part are figures of women with the chiton poderes, while figures, standing or seated, have symbols of Aphrodite, the dove and the pomegranate. Dr. Orsi thinks that these eidola, amongst which some probably represented the divinities of the catachthonic triad or of the cycle of Persephone, are anterior to the new temple, which he supposes built in the fifth or fourth century B.C. The second heap of remains consists of large rectangular trenchers, faced with tiles, within which thousands of skyphoi were placed in rows, one inside the other. Perhaps some ritual character must be given to this strange occurrence. This part of the ground was closed on the east by an Hellenic wall of good construction. On the north was found a well with the rim made of bricks, probably sacred, and in this well, which is not very deep, were found some fifty coins of the Roman Empire, dating from the first to the third century, the oldest being at the bottom.

DR. HUMANN, who has been engaged for some years in explorations in Asia Minor, again reports his good fortune. In the neighbourhood of Smyrna he has excavated five marble lions of gigantic size. His account of the population of Northern Syria is interesting. In one village he and his companion, Dr. Puchstein, were a little scandalized, but much amused, at the hesitation of their hosts to believe that there was such a state as Prussia, or even as Germany, in Europe. Europe, in the popular geography of the villager, was divided into three nations: "those of Moscow," the "Englis," and the "Francis." They had heard of the Crimean War and of a later war between the "Francis" and the "Bismarcklis." They did not know that the "Bismarcklis" were neighbours both of Russia and France.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—'Faust,' 'Carmen,'
ST. JAMES'S HALL.—The Richter Concerts. M. Paderewski's Piano Recital.

THE Royal Italian Opera season opened at Covent Garden Theatre on Monday under circumstances which were, in all probability, unprecedented in the history of the lyric drama. The subscription both of the public and the librarians is understood to be exceptionally large, and it was all secured without any official announcements from the impresario. The well-remembered opera prospectus, couched in the most flowery and gushing language, was not a document in which implicit reliance could be reposed; but it is a new departure to commence a season without making promises of any kind, and Mr. Augustus Harris may well be proud of the public confidence reposed in him. Three years ago, when he gave his first Italian opera season at Drury Lane, we expressed an opinion that he had it in his power to resuscitate this form of art, and our prediction has been amply justified by results. Further than this, it is now possible for musicians to regard Italian opera with respect, instead of indifference and contempt. The meretricious works of the Bellini-Donizetti school no longer command audiences, the prima donna no longer rules the stage, and every department is equally well cared for. The great advance in public taste necessitated reforms, and thanks are due to Mr. Harris for recognizing the fact and for the boldness and enterprise he has displayed in carrying out the needful changes. At the same time more remains to be done, and we shall be careful to place a finger on any imperfection that can be removed. There was much to admire in the performance of 'Faust' on Monday. M. Jean de Reszke was once more in voice and bearing an ideal exponent of the leading part. His brother was unfortunately unable to appear as Mephistopheles, and Signor Darvall was only a moderately efficient substitute. The new Marguerite, Mlle. Nuovina, has a somewhat hard, thin voice, but it is happily free from vibrato, and she acted with intelligence if with no great power. Of Madame Scalchi's Siebel and Signor d'Andrade's Valentine nothing need be said. The orchestra and chorus were excellent, and the stage arrangements were good, though the error is still made of playing the church scene at the beginning instead of at the end of the fourth act. The substitution of an interior removes one glaring absurdity, but Mephistopheles should be invisible, or at any rate seen but dimly in the distance.

The new tenor Signor Fernando Valero, who appeared as Don José in 'Carmen' on Tuesday, is likely to prove a useful performer. His high notes are of good quality, but there is an unpleasant nasal twang in his medium register. As an actor he showed marked ability. Mlle. Zélie de Lussan's Carmen is the best in every sense that we have had since Madame Minnie Hauk created the part in this country, and Signor d'Andrade is an unexceptionable Toreador. In place of Miss Macintyre, indisposed, Mlle. Colombati was an agreeable Michaela. Again the excellence of the chorus was noticeable, and the mounting was extremely picturesque.

Although the exigencies of public taste render it necessary to bestow special attention upon the music of Beethoven and Wagner at the Richter Concerts it cannot be laid to the conductor's charge that he neglects other masters. The symphony performed last Monday night was Schumann's in c, generally known as No. 2, though in chronological order it should be No. 4. This beautiful work is not only Schumann's greatest effort in orchestral composition, but it is regarded by many as one of the two finest symphonies composed since Beethoven, the other being Schubert's in the same key, which Schumann himself unearthed and sent from Vienna to Leipzig, where for the first time it met with an appreciative audience. The Wagner pieces in the programme were 'Hagen's Wacht' from 'Götterdämmerung,' Hans Sachs's monologue, 'Wahn, Wahn!' from 'Die Meistersinger,' both sung with the utmost expression by Mr. Henschel, and the Overture to 'Tannhäuser.' To musicians, however, the most interesting item was Bach's Triple Concerto in a minor for flute, violin, and pianoforte, with orchestral accompaniment. This is not the work so highly eulogized by Spitta, to which we referred when commenting upon the Richter prospectus, but another concerto arranged from a better-known Prelude and Fugue in a minor with an adagio taken from the organ works. Spitta remarks concerning it that it forms an arrangement "of really dazzling quality and artistic splendour." It certainly must be placed among Bach's finest concerted instrumental works, and as the performance by Mr. Vivian, Mr. Schiever, and Madame Hopekirk was excellent it made a strong impression and a suitable contrast to the modern music.

M. Paderewski created a far more favourable impression at his second recital on Tuesday afternoon than he did on the occasion of his first appearance. There was very little exaggeration and much intelligence in his reading of Bach's 'Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue' and Beethoven's Sonata in d, Op. 28; and in Chopin's Étude in f, Op. 25, Ballade in f minor, and Nocturne in c minor he played exquisitely, the general character of the interpretation recalling that of Rubinstein in the same pieces. Here for the first time we were enabled to agree with the eulogy bestowed upon the Polish artist by Parisian critics. It is only fair to add that at the previous recital M. Paderewski may have been unfavourably influenced by the sparse attendance and the inferior pianoforte on which he played. On Tuesday there was a marked improvement in both matters.

Musical Gossip.

It is little short of ridiculous for pianists of such moderate calibre as Miss Else Sonntag to give public recitals at this period of the year, when even performers of the highest capacity cannot receive the attention they deserve. Miss Sonntag's audience at the Steinway Hall on Friday last week was small in numbers, and her rendering of Bach's 'Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue,' and various pieces by Chopin, Schumann, and other composers was not in any sense remarkable.

On the same afternoon Herr Stavenhagen secured a large audience in St. James's Hall at his only recital during the present season. Musicians are naturally attracted to his performances, for, if not invariably free from objection, they are always interesting. An apology was circulated on the young pianist's behalf on the ground of illness, but his playing was almost as striking as usual. We have recently commented on his interpretation of Beethoven's Sonata in a flat, Op. 110, Liszt's misnamed Sonata in b minor, the Études in e and c sharp minor from Paganini, and Haydn's Variations in f minor. It would be well for Herr Stavenhagen to enlarge his repertory somewhat. As regards the classic masters it seems at present to be rather circumscribed.

BARE record must suffice concerning the first of another series of Messrs. Max Heinrich and Schönberger's agreeable recitals, which took place at the Steinway Hall on Friday evening last week. The programme included Chopin's Sonata in e minor, selections from Jensen's 'Spanish Song Book,' and Wagner's 'Feuerzauber' from 'Die Walküre.'

MADAME MARIE ROZE's concert at St. James's Hall last Saturday afternoon was one of those prodigious entertainments which were once highly fashionable during the summer season. There were twenty-six items in the programme, and the number of artists who appeared, in addition to the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society and the Meister Glee Singers, certainly testified to the personal regard generally felt for the concert-giver, though criticism of their individual efforts is impossible, and, indeed, undesirable.

On the same afternoon Mr. E. H. Thorne gave an interesting chamber concert, which deserved more attention than it can now receive. His programme included but four items, namely, a Pianoforte Trio in c minor, from his own pen; a Pianoforte Quartet in f sharp minor, by Algernon Ashton; Beethoven's great Sonata in b flat, Op. 106; and Brahms's Waltzes for four hands, Op. 39. The concert-giver was assisted by Messrs. Jules and Maurice Koopman, Mr. Hubert Hunt, and Mr. Herbert Thorne.

On Saturday evening Madame Madeline Schiller, a pianist who has been absent from London for several years, gave an orchestral concert at the Princes' Hall under the direction of Mr. Henschel. Her principal solo was Chopin's Concerto in e minor, in which she displayed brilliant technique, but no special qualification as a Chopin executant. The finale, however, was admirably played, and in other pieces by Liszt, Rubinstein, and Mendelssohn Madame Schiller showed herself a thorough artist, who in a season less remarkable for pianists than the present would obtain considerable attention. The orchestral items in the programme were unimportant. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel contributed some vocal pieces.

An extremely interesting concert was given at the Hampstead Conservatoire Hall on Wednesday evening, Dr. J. F. Bridge's overture 'Morte d'Arthur,' Dr. Hubert Parry's 'English' Symphony, Prof. Stanford's 'Revenge,' and Mr. MacCunn's overture 'Land of the Mountain and the Flood' being all performed under the direction of their respective composers. Miss Mary Willis contributed some vocal pieces with much acceptance, and the Conservatoire choir was heard to advantage in the choral items.

WE understand that in consequence of the substantial support accorded to the Carl Rosa Opera Company during the recent performances at Drury Lane, the London season next year will be of longer duration.

THE collection of musical instruments in connexion with the Military Exhibition was opened to the public on Wednesday. It contains a large number of interesting examples, including the contra-fagotto made for Handel, a trumpet of the fifteenth century, the Kuntz flute played upon by Frederick the Great, &c. We shall return to this exhibit, concerning which a series

MON.
TUES.
WED.
—
—
THURS.
—
—
FRI.
—
SAT.
—
—
SUN.
—
MUSIC and Deb
Doors op

ADEL
a Play
SHAFF
Arthur

MR him a antly but h with

of historical and explanatory lectures is being organized.

MADAME CARREÑO, who gave her second piano recital at St. James's Hall on Thursday afternoon, is certainly one of the best of the foreign pianists now before the London public. Her rendering of Schumann's 'Etudes Symphoniques' was splendid in a technical sense, though perhaps a little deficient in sentiment, and Handel's 'Harmonious Blacksmith' was played without the exaggerations generally considered necessary at the present time. In pieces in the bravura style Madame Carreño was unexceptionable. She gives a third recital on June 17th.

ACCORDING to the Bristol Times and Mirror Mr. George Riseley will give four orchestral concerts in London next winter.

M. PADEREWSKI will give an orchestral concert at St. James's Hall on June 10th. Mr. Henschel will be the conductor, and Mr. Willy Hess the leader.

THE death is announced of M. Naudin, who for several years during the management of the late Mr. Frederick Gye was a useful tenor at the Royal Italian Opera. He never won much distinction, but he was generally acceptable, perhaps his best parts being Vasco di Gama and Fra Diavolo. The death is also announced of M. Hubert Léonard, the once celebrated violinist, who played Mendelssohn's Concerto at its first performance in Berlin, 1845, at the invitation of the composer. At that time Léonard was a greatly admired executant, but to the present generation he was known solely as a teacher in Paris. He wrote several books of instruction for his instrument, and also some concertos which are already forgotten.

WE are pleased to learn that Mr. Goring Thomas's opera 'Nadeshda' has met with great success at Breslau, and another triumph for English musical art has been gained by Miss Fanny Davies at Rome. The Italian papers speak of her playing in terms of unqualified admiration.

NESSLER's new opera, 'Die Rose von Strassburg,' produced at Munich at the beginning of the present month, has failed to meet with much acceptance.

A GERMAN opera society has been established in Chicago, principally for the production of Wagner's music dramas, which are at present little known in the Western city.

CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK.

- MON. Royal Italian Opera, 'Faust,' 8.
- TUES. Royal Italian Opera, 'Les Huguenots,' 8.
- WED. M. Pierre René Hirsch's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Princes' Hall.
- Schor Albeniz's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Steinway Hall.
- Royal Italian Opera, 'Lohengrin,' 8.
- Messrs. Ludwig and Whitehouse's Chamber Concert, 8, Princes' Hall.
- Musical Guild Concert, 8.30, Kensington Town Hall.
- THURS. M. Paderewski's Pianoforte Recital, 3, St. James's Hall.
- Schor Albeniz's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Steinway Hall.
- Mr. Ernest Fowle's Concert, 3, Princes' Hall.
- Royal Italian Opera, 'Don Giovanni,' 8.
- Madame Sophie Lowe's Concert, 8.30, Princes' Hall.
- FRI. M. Sapelnikoff's Pianoforte Recital, 3, St. James's Hall.
- Royal Italian Opera.
- Mr. Max Heinrich and Mr. Schönberger's Vocal and Piano Recital, 8.30, Steinway Hall.
- Mr. Sidney Herbert-Baile's Concert, 9, St. James's Hall.
- SAT. Patti Concert, 3, St. James's Hall.
- Mr. Oberthur's Concert, 3, Princes' Hall.
- Mr. Jan Mulder's Concert, 3.30, St. James's Hall (Banqueting Room).
- Royal Italian Opera.
- Signor L. Dezza's Concert, 8.30, Princes' Hall.

DRAMA

MATINÉE OF IN A DAY, a Poetic Drama, by AUGUSTA WEBSTER, and Debut of the Author's Daughter, FRIDAY, May 30th, at 2.30. Doors open at 2—TERRY'S THEATRE.

THE WEEK.

ADELPHI.—Afternoon Performance: 'The Bride of Love,' a Play in Four Acts. By Robert Buchanan.
SHAFTESBURY.—'Judah,' a Play in Three Acts. By Henry Arthur Jones.

MR. BUCHANAN has dramatic grip. Give him a skeleton and he can, as has been abundantly proven, clothe it with respectable flesh; but he has been scarcely wise in meddling with the legend of Cupid and Psyche. It is not, of course, his fault that legends concerning 'Olympus' faded hierarchy' when seen on the stage are associated with the idea of music by Offenbach or Gilbertian satire. One strong scene, in order to vindicate his reputation as a dramaturge, Mr. Buchanan has obtained. It is necessarily that in which Psyche, insisting upon the gratification of her wish, gazes on the unveiled godhead of her spouse, and shrinks back scorched into blindness by the dazzling presence. This portion of the play was powerful and stimulating. The remainder, though written in workmanlike style and not lacking either idea or expression, is as remote from Greek as it can well be. With the treatment of the subject we have no disposition to find fault. What is really wrong is the atmosphere. In spite of himself Mr. Buchanan has yielded to the influence of his predecessors. A Venus who has grown old and is expressly declared to be a bit of a shrew, and a Cupid who goes to bed early at night, having apparently to be up early in order to go to a board school, need the accompaniments of Offenbach rather than of Mr. Slaughter or Dr. Mackenzie; and a plump and indolent Zephyros, who indulges in comic asides and fulfils to Eros the functions which Mercury did not always scorn to render to Jupiter, comes out of the 'Wicked World.' During no inconsiderable portion of the play we seemed to be contemplating 'Cinderella,' and more than half the third and best act was a species of alteration in the love scenes in 'A Midsummer Night's Dream,' with Zephyros for an elderly and obese Puck. Mr. Buchanan's play was received with much favour. It has none the less, it is to be feared, few elements of enduring vitality.

One lovely piece of pure Greek beauty there was, the dance of Euphrosyne, rendered with an accompaniment of clanging cymbals by Miss Letty Lind. One could not, indeed, resist the wish to see a figure and style so typically virginal and Greek in the character of Psyche. Psyche herself was played with much earnestness, and in the end with some passion, by Miss Harriett Jay. Miss Ada Cavendish, as Aphrodite, spoke with an elocution the rest might copy with advantage. Mr. Thalberg looked well, and gave with much spirit the rôle of Eros. With a better delivery he would be a very acceptable representative of the part. Mr. Lionel Rignold acted with no extravagance in the strange freaks of Zephyros, and Miss Clara Jecks and Miss Marie Fraser were pleasing in subordinate figures. Mr. Buchanan should dip again into Keats before he meddles with a theme such as this, and after so doing will probably henceforward leave it alone.

In 'Judah' Mr. Jones may claim to have supplied the public with a play purely English in origin, which may yet in many respects compare with the best-known productions of foreign stages. Its excellences are those in which the modern English drama is most notably deficient. Genuinely dramatic scenes spring out of a healthy and stimulating plot. No theatrical artifice of procuring situation at the cost of development of story is employed. Psychology has received close attention, balance is carefully observed, and the comic scenes, in which modern scientific affectations are cleverly satirized, set off the scenes vibrating with passion of the central action, and are cleverly interwoven with the texture of the play. At one period in the second act the treatment of the heroine is, perhaps, too cruel, and the anxiety of the public is too poignant. More than one of the characters, moreover, with a less competent interpretation would have been risky. The judgment of the author was sound, however, and the care of the management was exemplary, the result being a scene of enthusiasm at the close which has scarcely been equalled since the production of 'Caste' and 'Ours.' It seems at first as though the heroine were the central figure, and that the title of the piece should have been 'Vashti Dethic.' In the end Mr. Jones is proved to be justified in this as in other matters. Of peasant origin, a dreamer, a mystic, almost a fanatic, Judah Llewellyn, whose mother was a Jewess, has become an enthusiastic minister of a Dissenting sect. He adores as a woman and reverences as a saint Vashti Dethic, a young girl who by fasting and prayer works miraculous cures. Believing in her mission, he is the means of introducing her with her father into the house of the Earl of Asgarby, whose young daughter, the frail survivor of a family of seven, takes a strong fancy to her. On this occasion the fasting which is indispensable to the working of miracles is made real. Under the superintendence of Prof. Jopp, a man of science, Vashti is placed in a tower, which is jealously guarded, and, as her father cannot reach her, she incurs real risk of starvation. Among her unsuspected guardians is Judah, who, retaining his old skill as a climber, scales the castle walls to be near the woman he worships. While thus occupied he overhears a conversation between Vashti and her father, and learns that her cures are imposition. An interview with her follows, in which reproaches melt into entreaties. Do what he will, he cannot break from her; and as she—a deceiver in part only, and the tool of her father—worships him, she grows nearer to him in being changed from a supposed saint into an erring woman. Hers at whatever cost he will now be. They are surprised, and Vashti has barely time to escape into the keep, which is practically her prison. When appealed to whether he has brought her food or seen her eat it, he swears truthfully in the negative. When asked if he has seen her outside the walls, he hesitates a while, and then perjures himself. His penitence for this offence, his ultimate expiation, and his redemption of the woman for whose sake he has polluted his fair fame, give rise to scenes more touching and real than have often been seen on the modern stage. These are very finely rendered by Mr. Willard and by Miss Olga Brandon. Two parts of the sort could scarcely be better played. Miss Bessie Hutton, Mr. Sant Matthews, Mr. F. Kerr, and other actors, gave surprisingly truthful representations of characters of to-day. A more adequate and artistic performance of a play of genuine power has not often been exhibited to the public.

Grammatic Gossip.

'THE WRONG DOOR,' by Ina Leon Cassilis, produced on Tuesday afternoon at the Comedy

Theatre, is a three-act farce, turning upon the residence in the same flat of two ladies bearing the same name. When, accordingly, an interviewer in pursuit of his calling waits upon an elderly philanthropist, he meets with a young actress, who, recognizing his mistake, thoroughly fools him. Though fairly comic, this idea is clumsily worked, and the piece is a failure. Nothing in the acting calls for comment.

On the same afternoon 'My Mother,' a three-act farce by Miss Amy Steinburg, originally announced for the Thursday previous, was given with success at Toole's Theatre, the author playing a part in it.

Upon its revival at the Royalty 'The Barrister' of Messrs. G. Manville Fenn and J. H. Darnley obtained again a favourable reception. Much of its interest is lost, however, in consequence of Mr. Mervin electing to play Arthur Maxwell the barrister with a military moustache. The general performance is boisterous, but not ineffective. 'The Bailiff' of Mr. F. W. Broughton, also given, is a touching comedieta in one act. It was feebly played.

MR. AUGUSTIN DALY is in London, making arrangements for the appearance of his company at the Lyceum. The company will leave America on the 31st, and will on June 10th appear in 'A Night Off.' A varied programme is announced, the most important novelties being 'As You Like It,' with Miss Ada Rehan as Rosalind, Mr. Lewis as Touchstone, and Mr. John Drew as Orlando; and 'The Great Unknown,' a piece in the eccentric vein of 'Nancy & Co.'

MRS. BERNARD BEERE has reached home still suffering from the severe attack of illness she experienced on the Riviera.

MR. FLEAY writes saying that his volume which we announced last week will not be supplementary to Genest, but "in a sense complementary."

THE performances of Dr. Todhunter's 'Sicilian Idyll' came to an end on Saturday last. Dr. Todhunter knows how to write blank verse, and his pastoral play is an agreeable piece of work. The scenery was good, and so were the dresses and the dancing. The acting was creditable, the women being much superior to the men.

'A CONVICT'S WIFE,' by Mr. W. Sapte, jun., was revived on Monday at the Grand Theatre.

'AS LARGE AS LIFE,' a three-act farce by Mr. Arthur Shirley, and 'In Love,' an anonymous one-act comedieta, have been given at Terry's Theatre. Neither piece calls for criticism.

ON the 7th inst. the eminent Swedish dramatist Anna Carlotta Leffler (Madame Edgren) was married in Rome to the Duke of Cajanello. The new duchess has many English friends, who will be glad to congratulate the author of 'True Women' on this interesting occasion.

WE hear of the death, in America, of Mr. Charles Vandenhoff, son of Mr. George Vandenhoff, and grandson of Mr. John Vandenhoff the tragedian, who was a prominent member of Macready's company in the early stage of his career as a manager.

NEXT WEEK'S NOVELTIES AND REVIVALS.

MON. Toole's (Evening), 'Adoption,' a "Matrimonial Mixture," by Richard Henry.
TUES. Lyceum (Evening), Revival of 'Olivia.'
WED. Terry's (Afternoon), Production of 'Wasted a Wife,' by J. H. Darnley.
THURS. Vaudeville (Afternoon), Benefit of Miss Lucy Buckstone.
— Prince of Wales's (Afternoon), 'The Anonymous Letter.'
FRI. Terry's (Afternoon), 'In a Day,' by Augustus Webster.

[These announcements are subject to changes of plan on the part of managers.]

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—F. J. P.—J. H.—T. H.—F. P.—A. H.—received.
No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION BY POST.

	s.	d.
For Twelve Months	15	3
For Six Months	7	8

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW STORIES AT ALL BOOKSELLERS'.

BY FRANK R. STOCKTON.

THE STORIES OF THE THREE BURGLARS.

By FRANK R. STOCKTON, Author of 'Rudder Grange,' 'The Hundredth Man,' &c. Crown 8vo. boards, 1s.
The First Edition was exhausted on the day of publication. Second Edition now ready.

BY RUDYARD KIPLING.

THE STORY OF THE GADSBYS. By

RUDYARD KIPLING, Author of 'Soldiers Three,' 'Plain Tales from the Hills,' &c. Crown 8vo. boards, 1s.

NEW NOVELS AT ALL THE LIBRARIES.

THE WAY OF TRANSGRESSORS.

By E. RENTOU ESLE. 3 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, 31s. 6d.

WITH FIRE AND SWORD: an Historical Novel of Poland and Russia. By HENRYK SIENKIEWICZ.

Translated from the Polish by JEREMIAH CURTIN. Crown 8vo. cloth, 10s. 6d.

THE CONSPIRATOR: a Romance of

Real Life. By Count PAUL P.—. Edited by FRANK HARKUT. 2 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, 21s.

"There is no lack of startling incident and sensational adventure in this record of Russian oppression and Polish intrigue.....The interest of the story seldom flags."—Speaker.

NEW ADDITION TO LOW'S STANDARD NOVELS. 6s. SERIES.

SPRINGHAVEN: a Tale of the Great War. By R. D. BLACKMORE, Author of 'Lorna Doone,' &c. With numerous Illustrations by Alfred Parsons and F. Barnard. Small post 8vo. cloth, 6s.

"The story is one of Mr. Blackmore's best. A fine touch of romance reveals the author of 'Lorna Doone' on almost every page."—Saturday Review.

JAMES D. DANA'S NEW WORK.

CHARACTERISTICS OF VOLCANOES. With Contributions of Facts and Principles from the Hawaiian Islands. By JAMES D. DANA. Fully illustrated by Maps, Diagrams, &c. Demy 8vo. cloth, 18s.

THE INFLUENCE OF SEA POWER

upon HISTORY, 1660—1783. By Capt. A. T. MAHAN, United States Navy. Demy 8vo. cloth, 18s.

ANONYMS: a Dictionary of Revealed

Authorship. By WILLIAM CUSHING, B.A., Compiler of 'Initials and Pseudonyms.' 2 vols. royal 8vo. cloth, 52s. 6d.

SAVAGE LONDON: Lights and

Shadows of Riverside Character and Queer Life in London Dens. By Mrs. MUSGRAVE, Author of 'Our Flat,' 'Illusions,' &c. New Edition. Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

BEETHOVEN. By H. A. Rudall.

Being the New Volume in the "Great Musician Series." Edited by the late Dr. F. HUEFFER. Small post 8vo. cloth extra, 3s.

Now ready, price ONE SHILLING,

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

JUNE NUMBER.

COMMENCING A NEW VOLUME.

Contents.

ALPHONSE DAUDET. Drawn by J. W. Alexander. Frontispiece.

PORT TARASCON: the Last Adventures of the Illustrious Tartarin. Alphonsine Daudet. With 24 Illustrations, drawn by Luigi Rossi, F. de Myrbach, and others.

THROUGH THE CAUCASUS. Vicomte Eugène Melchior de Vogüé. 12 Illustrations, drawn by Dr. Thulstrup and H. D. Nichols.

THE ENEMY'S DISTANCE. Range-finding at Sea by Electricity. Park Benjamin, Ph.D. With 3 Diagrams.

THE AMERICAN BURLESQUE. Laurence Hutton. Fully illustrated.

FÜRST BISMARCK. George Moritz Wahl. With Full-Page (Plate) Illustration.

THE BEST-GOVERNED CITY IN THE WORLD (Birmingham). Julian Ralph. Illustrated.

THE YOUNG WHIST-PLAYER'S NOVITIATE. Professor F. B. Goodrich.

CHAP-BOOK HEROES. Howard Pyle. Illustrated.

SIX HOURS IN SQUANTICO. F. Hopkinson Smith. Illustrated.

&c. &c. &c.

London:

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & RIVINGTON

(LIMITED),

St. Dunstan's House, Fetter-lane, Fleet-street, E.C.

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

NOVELS AT ALL CIRCULATING LIBRARIES.

By B. L. FARJEON.

THE MYSTERY OF M. FELIX.

3 vols.

By the Author of
'Great Porter Square,' &c.

By FLORENCE MARRYAT.

BLINDFOLD. 3 vols.

By the Author of
'My Sister the Actress,' &c.

"The story is well conceived and skilfully told. May be read with considerable pleasure."—Scotsman.

By IZA DUFFUS HARDY.

A NEW OTHELLO. 3 vols.

By the Author of
'Love, Honour, and Obedience,' &c.

"The closing chapters are tremendous in their intensity."—Athenæum.
"A New Othello" is one of the most powerful and original stories we have had from the author's pen as yet....It is admirably conceived and well worked out."—Lady's Pictorial.

"The reader will at once perceive that 'A New Othello' is, perhaps, the best of the many novels that have come from the pen of Iza Duffus Hardy. It is on the whole, a very good story, and it is told with commendable skill....The dialogue is often crisp and pleasant, and some of the characters are portrayed with considerable force."—Scotsman.

"A New Othello" is intensely exciting....Is an exceedingly clever novel."—Life.
"A New Othello" introduces us to some scenes portrayed with more than common power."—County Gentleman.

By Colonel ROWAN HAMILTON.

THE LAST OF THE CORNETS.

2 vols. 12s.

"The two volumes are brightly and pleasantly written. Colonel Hamilton is quite at home in his pictures of barrack life, and all the minutiae which constitute the 'form' of mess and 'ante-room'....What strikes us as being particularly good in the book are the descriptions of the characters. These are done in a few bold and vigorous touches....We may safely predict that Colonel Rowan Hamilton's book will be one of the 'hits' of the season, and will find a welcome place on the tables of clubland, barrack-room, and boudoir."—Dublin Daily Express.

By Mrs. HIBBERT WARE.

FAIRFAX OF FUYSTON; or, a Practice Confessed. 3 vols.

By the Author of
'The King of Hain,' 'His Dearest Wish,' &c.

"That fertile writer—Mrs. Hibbert Ware...Quaint, queer, and questionable trade tactics and social customs peculiar to Lancashire and Yorkshire in the beginning of the seventeenth century are not only carefully detailed and contrasted with those of modern times, but they are skilfully utilized in the development of what, after all, is a pleasantly told love story of the olden times. Highwaymen, too, cold-blooded maidens, pious pure-principled persons, genuine pretences, and wily witches figure prominently among the admirably sketched characters met with in the novel."—Scotsman.

"Mrs. Hibbert Ware describes picturesquely and mediates romantically....She is careful in her conversations and choice of incidents to keep to the tone and manner of the time. 'Fairfax of Fuyston' is, on the whole, perhaps the best book of the kind we have had for some little time, and a great advance in many ways on other works by the same hand."—Whitehall Review.

By FERGUS HUME.

THE MAN WITH A SECRET.

3 vols.

By the Author of
'The Mystery of a Handsome Cab,' 'The Piccadilly Puzzle,' 'Miss Mephistopheles,' &c. [June 10.]

At all Booksellers' and Bookstalls.

John Strange Winter's FERRERS

COURT. A New and Original Tale. By the Author of 'Booties Baby,' 'Buttons,' 'Mrs. Bob,' &c. In paper cover, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d. [June 24.]

Alfred C. Calmoun's THE CONFES-

SIONS OF A DOORMAT. A New and Original Tale. By the Author of 'The Amber Heart,' &c. In paper cover, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d.
"A story both stirring and pathetic."—Globe.
"Simple, pathetic, and unaffected, which will touch many hearts."—Echo.
"A book to be bought."—Stage.

Mrs. Hungerford's A LIFE'S RE-

MORSE. Second Edition. By the Author of 'Molly Bawn.' Cloth, 2s. 6d.

Hawley Smart's A BLACK BUSI-

NESS. A New and Original Tale. By the Author of 'Bretter Langton,' &c. In paper cover, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d.

F. V. WHITE & CO.

31, Southampton-street, Strand, W.C.

SATURDAY, MAY 31, 1890.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
A NEW BIOGRAPHY OF NELSON	697
BLUNDERS AND FORGERIES	698
THE EDITORS OF THE TIME	699
MR. MACCARTHY'S HISTORY OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION	700
NOVELS OF THE WEEK	701
OUR LIBRARY TABLE—LIST OF NEW BOOKS	702-703
EPITAPH ON MARY BOYLE; COLERIDGE AND THE ANTI-JACOBIANS; UNPUBLISHED LETTERS OF SAMUEL PEPPY; THE INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF ORIENTALISTS	703-705
LITERARY GOSSIP	706
SCIENCE—ORNITHOLOGICAL LITERATURE; GEOGRAPHICAL NOTES; SOCIETIES; MEETINGS; GOSSIP	707-708
FINE ARTS—THE SALON; WESTMINSTER HALL; MINOR EXHIBITIONS; NEW PRINTS; EXCAVATIONS AT MEGALOPOLIS; SALES; GOSSIP	709-712
MUSIC—THE WEEK; GOSSIP; CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK	712-714
DRAMA—THE WEEK; GOSSIP; NEXT WEEK'S NOVEL-TIES	714
MISCELLANEA	714

LITERATURE

Heroes of the Nations Series. Edited by Evelyn Abbott, M.A.—Horatio Nelson and the Naval Supremacy of England. By W. Clark Russell. (Putnam's Sons.)

NOTHING could be better judged than the opening of a series of national heroes with a life of Nelson. Southey's popular little volume, although charmingly written, leaves much to be desired in its account of Nelson both in his professional and personal relations; and there was clearly room for a book of reasonable size which should tell the story of Nelson's career with accuracy and with understanding. After a careful perusal of Mr. Russell's book we are compelled to add that there is still room. The book is sadly wanting both in accuracy and appreciation. Mr. Russell has a wide reputation as a writer of tales connected with the sea; but he has failed in discussing the stern realities of war and the idiosyncrasies of a complex historical character. Whether as a sailor or as a man of letters, the author's studies have of necessity led his thoughts into a channel widely different from that of his present undertaking; and the result is that the book has all the appearance of having been written to order, after a hasty perusal of such materials as were most easily accessible, without much inquiry into their value as records of fact. The pages teem with small errors, which, however trifling in themselves, become important by reason of their number, and which, in any case, betray either carelessness, or—as is more probable—a want of familiarity with the subject. Thus, for instance, Nelson at Jamaica is said to have offered his services to the "Admiralty," meaning the admiral. The French 74-gun ship Barras, in the action off Toulon on March 13th, 1795, is spoken of as the "Jean Barras"; Barras's baptismal name was Paul; but Paul or Jean, the ship had nothing to do with it. Mr. Brierly, the master of the Bellona at Copenhagen, is described as a "mate." Admiral Lutwidge is always called "Ludwidge." The Amphion is said to have run from off Lisbon to Gibraltar in eighteen hours; it really was in fifty. Jervis was not "neglected and unemployed for nearly twenty years"; his longest spell on half-pay as a captain was less than six years (March, 1763—February, 1769) during a time of retrenchment and reduction. It is incorrect to assume that Nelson embarked on board the Seahorse "as a foremast hand"; but having made this incorrect assumption, Mr. Russell draws apparently on his imagination, and says: "It was not long before Farmer noticed the lad's smartness and attention to his duties, and during the voyage out he called him on to the quarter-deck and rated him as midshipman. He was now a naval officer." In 1773 no one considered a midshipman to be a naval officer; and officer or not, Nelson was rated midshipman on the day he joined the Seahorse.

When little inaccuracies abound it cannot be supposed that there are not more serious errors: these are, in fact, frequent. Mr. Russell has taken slight, if any pains to investigate disputed points, and in perfect innocence transcribes from Southey or from Pettigrew stories which have been clearly disproved. Thus he repeats Pettigrew's story of the death and funeral of Lady Hamilton, which has been proved to be a baseless fabrication; Lady Hamilton was buried in an oak coffin in consecrated ground, by a Catholic priest, and at a cost of 28*l.* 10*s.*, as shown by the receipt now in the possession of Mr. Morrison. He repeats from Southey the story of Nelson's meeting with young Willemoes, whose name he travesties into "Welmoes," and, as an additional adornment, says that Nelson embraced him. Southey does not get beyond shaking hands; but, as matter of fact, Nelson did not see Willemoes, who, he was told, was on duty on board his ship. The officer of whom Nelson made the complimentary speech was Capt. Müller, of Hajen (the Shark), who had been taken prisoner. The circumstances of Troubridge's visit to Naples on June 17th, 1798, have been threshed out from authentic sources, and the story related by Pettigrew has been authoritatively disproved. Erroneous date and all, it is, however, repeated by Mr. Russell, who introduces it with the words, "The romantic story goes." He does, indeed, refer to Mr. Jeaffreson's refutation of it; but it would have been better to say plainly that it was a lie for a purpose, invented by Lady Hamilton. In what he says about Nelson's conduct at Naples in the summer of 1799 Mr. Russell is much more guarded. No passage in Nelson's career has been so warmly discussed as the annulling of the capitulation of the Neapolitan forts. In connexion with it accusations of bad faith have been freely lavished on him, yet all that his present biographer can find to say about it is that it is "much too stale and worn out a topic to be here discussed." As it is the one topic in Nelson's public conduct which has been called in question, no part of his life was so much in need of consideration; and it is difficult to stifle a suspicion that Mr. Russell's sentence would more accurately convey his meaning if it stood, "a topic which I cannot be troubled to consider with the care it would require." The short comment which he does permit himself to make shows, at any rate, that he does not understand the question at issue. He says that, in common law, "a man is bound by the acts of his own agent," and implies that similarly Nelson was bound by the acts of Capt. Foote. Of course he was, so far as Capt. Foote was his agent; but not when Capt. Foote exceeded his instructions, which must be held as the equivalent of the power-of-attorney of civil life.

It would be ungracious to follow out in further detail this catalogue of errors and misunderstandings in the relation of fact; and it is unnecessary to do so, because— notwithstanding their number, which is excessive, and the importance of many of them—they are insignificant in comparison with the misrepresentations of the teaching of our naval history and of Nelson's great victories. What, for instance, can any one who is even moderately versed in our naval records say of such a passage as this?—

"It was by the thrust of the pike, the deadly swing of the tomahawk or the cutlass, the daring hurricane-leap from bulwark to bulwark, the impetuous and irresistible rush along the enemy's deck, the red-hot hand-to-hand conflict swiftly terminated—by these means it was the British sailor achieved those issues which the true-born Englishman has a right to boast of and to proudly recall."

What can he say, except that an Englishman has no "right to boast of," and most certainly cannot "proudly recall," events which never happened? Mr. Russell would seem to share the popular misconception as to the partiality of English naval officers and seamen for boarding. The reality is that during the last three centuries their skill and prowess have been persistently turned the other way—their aim has been to avoid being boarded, because the crews of English ships were, of set purpose, numerically inferior to the crews of foreign ships of the same rate; the English naval policy being in this respect similar to that of the ancient Athenians, who considered the ship's armament rather than the men's as the effective part of a naval force. There is not an instance on record of an English line-of-battle ship or frigate capturing one of the enemy's by boarding till after the possibility of effective resistance had been pounded out of her. Even in the celebrated capture of the Chesapeake, which perhaps comes nearest to it, the famous "fore-bitter" might have reminded Mr. Russell that the enemy were driven from their guns by the Shannon's broadsides before

Brave Broke, he waved his sword, Crying, Now, my lads, we'll board; and the prosaic James, with whom Roosevelt for once agrees, gives the number of the Shannon's crew as 330, of the Chesapeake's as 380; or, excluding boys, as 306 and 376 respectively.

So far then Mr. Russell's history is decidedly at fault; but it is when he proceeds to pass judgment on Nelson's strategy and tactics that he is at his worst. "Fifty years ago," he tells us,

"a naval officer would probably watch with profound interest Nelson's manoeuvres off Toulon, as they are described by his biographers and in his own dispatches and letters. But the seamanship of those days, the strategies, the devices, the expedients are no longer of the least value vocationally [...]. In this century has happened a very revolution in sea affairs; the manoeuvres of Nelson are to be followed as historic studies; but professionally they are of no worth."

This, at any rate, is not the opinion of Sir Geoffrey Hornby, of Admiral Colomb, and of others of our present admirals who have specially studied the subject. They, on the contrary, think and teach that much, very much is to be learnt by the exact study of the past, and, above all, by the exact study of Nelson's campaigns and Nelson's battles. We do not gather that Mr. Russell wishes to oppose his opinion to that of the distinguished specialists we refer to; we think it is rather that he has written in ignorance not only of what they have taught, but of what it was that Nelson did really do. He could otherwise never have penned such sentences as these, culled at random from several others of the same significance:—

"The seminal principle of all Nelson's tactics was to have at the foe at once. Wait for nothing! shift your helm and go for him! get alongside as nimbly as your keel will carry you, and then fight!"

And again:—

"His great theory of warfare consisted in swiftness of resolution, in dashing at the enemy, in getting alongside of him, as close as channels or yardarms would permit, and in firing until he struck or was annihilated."

A careful study not only of what Nelson did and of how he did it, but of what he wrote about it, and of what other distinguished officers, English or French, have written about it, would probably go far to convince Mr. Russell of the enormity of his mistake; but as he has neglected this study we cannot now acquit him of having very imperfectly performed the task allotted to him. And it seems to have been a task; he seems to strain at the unwonted harness, and the irksome trammels of historic truth. But ever and anon the habits of years prevail; and leaving sober fact behind, he gives free play to his imagination in language which the mere commonplace historian may wonder at, even if he does not altogether admire. Here, for instance, is an account of the English fleet's putting to sea from Agincourt Sound on the 19th of January, 1805:

"The night had settled down black, but Nelson did not hesitate. The Victory took the lead with a light on her stern, and led the way in safety through a channel whose breadth was less than a quarter of a mile. This is a picture to remember: the sullen loom of the Bocian and Sardinian rocks, on either hand; the narrow space of dark waters, flashful with leaps of pallid froth to the whipping of the strong wind howling down the channel; the towering forms of the British ships in line ahead, sweeping in a phantom-like procession after that heap of windy faintness of lofty canvas denoting the Victory, upon whose quarter-deck paces the restless figure of Nelson."

What, compared with such magniloquence, is Nelson's feeble statement?—

"At three o'clock in the afternoon of the 19th Capt. Moubray made his report to me at Madalena, and at six the whole fleet was at sea, with a fresh breeze at W.N.W., steering to the southward along the Sardinian shore"; or even Southey's description?—

"The fleet immediately unmoored and weighed, and at six in the evening ran through the strait between Biche and Sardinia: a passage so narrow that the ships could only pass one at a time, each following the stern lights of its leader."

It was, unquestionably, a splendid bit of seamanship; but splendid seamanship in a fleet commanded by Nelson was very much a matter of course, and was not then considered as calling for any special comment.

Another passage, in which Mr. Russell describes the dawn of October 21st, 1805, is worth preserving as an example of the use, or abuse, of language:—

"The sun never rose upon a grander and more impressive ocean-picture. As the courses and hulls of the hindmost of the British vessels floated up the sea-line the blue girdle of the deep became a field of ships: giant structures bristling with guns, canvas swelling in clouds to the heavens from their tall black sides crowned with grim and formidable defences, crowds of sailors motionless in expectation, quarter-decks glittering with uniforms, sterns sparkling with gilt and the flash of great cabin windows, and a deep stillness everywhere, broken to the ears aboard the British only by the creaming wash of the bow-surge, shouldered off into yeast by the thrust of the cut-water as the towering liners, brave with bunting, rolled majestically onwards towards the concourse of giantesses awaiting them in the East....."

This must be very fine, yet it is hard to wholly understand it; and so far as it is intelligible it is not consonant with fact. We seem to gather that the British ships were giants and the French were giantesses; but the explanation of this curious statement escapes us, and perhaps in it we are mistaken. We should prefer a life of Nelson written in more homely language; and as we began by enunciating the leading qualities of the book which we conceive is wanting to supersede Southey's, we finish by repeating that Mr. Russell's is not that book.

Blunders and Forgeries: Historical Essays.

By Rev. T. E. Bridgett, of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer. (Kegan Paul & Co.)

OUR Romanist friends are beginning to wax aggressive. They have submitted too long, they think, to slander and derision, and they are no longer disposed to stand merely on the defensive. Accordingly Mr. Bridgett in these essays carries the war into the enemy's camp. He is clearly a vigorous writer, and, moreover, a man of some learning and research. His book will be most delightful reading to his co-religionists, and will doubtless afford them a valuable mine of telling stories to bring out upon occasion for the discomfiture of heretics and the confusion of militant Protestants greedy for lies—such lies as may be proved to be real bouncing lies.

Mr. Bridgett sets himself most successfully to expose two classes of misstatements which have been current among us all for many a long day. The first are mere blunders which incompetent writers have committed from carelessness or ignorance. The second are those which have no foundation in fact, but are declared to be based upon downright malevolent falsehood, or, as the author classes them, forgeries.

The blunders are exposed in the first five essays and very amusingly dealt with. Dr. Shirley, some twenty-five years ago, published two volumes of letters of the reign of Henry III. in the Rolls Series which have a value of their own. In one of them a priest is complained of for having two wives and claiming the bishop's dispensation. Of course, this was a glorious discovery, and not likely to be passed over by lovers of the picturesque. Accordingly Mr. Stephens, when writing his little 'History of the Diocese of Chichester' for the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, made capital out of the excellent story, and his reviewers picked it out as one of the plums. So it would be, and a very precious plum too, but that Mr. Bridgett shows, plainly enough, that the two wives were two benefices to which the uxorious pluralist was married.

In 1780 the lake near Newstead was drained, and in the mud there was discovered a brazen eagle which had evidently at one time been used in the church of Newstead Abbey. The thing was taken to pieces, and in the globe on which the eagle stood were some documents. Washington Irving was much impressed by this find, and wrote a book about Newstead, wherein he was rash enough to tell his readers what the documents were. What could they be but Papal indulgences giving the monks a licence to live unclean lives? Unluckily the aforesaid "documents" are still in existence, and turn out to be a single document—nothing worse than a general pardon of Henry V., granted to the monastery for a consideration when the king was short of money and had to get what he could out of the religious houses.

Mr. Hingeston in 1858 published John Capgrave's 'Book of the Illustrious Henries.' In an unlucky passage, dealing with the treatment which the remains of the Emperor Henry IV. received, occurs the following line:—

Afra capella fuit, quæ patris ossa tulit.

Mr. Hingeston rashly attacked the line, and translated it thus:—

A she-goat's skin receives his father's bones.

If he had only let it alone he might go to his own grave in peace, but how will he sleep now when Mr. Bridgett gently turns upon him with the information that the emperor's body lay for five years in the Chapel of St. Afra, at Spiers?

These are small matters, though they will be extremely diverting to some people. But the two longer essays on the Rood of Boxley and on Robert Ware are much more important contributions to that branch of historical literature which students find it vexatious to have to read, and which yet they cannot afford to be ignorant of. The case against Ware is made out with very damaging force by Mr. Bridgett, and it is impossible to help suspecting strongly indeed that the man was really a rogue, with a taste for making dupes of other people. But this essay has rather too much the look of an advocate's attack, it bears the stamp of passionate partisanship, and it does not carry conviction with it—at any rate, at first reading. We should like to hear what can be said on the other side. The charge has not been met, however, thus far, and it is so serious and so sweeping that it can hardly be passed over without further inquiry. As to the essay on the Rood of Boxley, it is an elaborate and not unsuccessful attempt to prove that the famous image about which so much has been written was nothing more than one of those mechanical figures like the images in the clock at Strasbourg, which had got out of repair, been tossed into a corner, forgotten, and fished up again when the inquisitors of Thomas Cromwell came round to discover all the harm they could find or invent. But why did not Mr. Bridgett remember that the Bishop of Rochester who preached the notorious sermon was John Hilsey, who himself had been the prior of the Dominicans at Rochester three years before he preached this very sermon at Paul's Cross? There is a point for him to make the most of in his next edition; and if the Catholic public, for whom he writes, do not speedily call for a second edition, it will be because they are not appreciative of a brilliant volume which is all on their own side.

On the Interpretation of Plato's Timæus: Critical Studies. With Special Reference to a Recent Edition. By J. Cook Wilson, M.A. (Nutt.)

THE title of this pamphlet, of more than one hundred and forty pages, is to some extent misleading, as the contents are nothing more than an expansion of certain lively attacks on Mr. Archer-Hind's edition of the 'Timæus,' one of which appeared in the Classical Review of March, 1889, and was briefly answered in the ensuing number by Mr. Archer-Hind. If scholars are to take the peccant edition at Mr. Cook Wilson's valuation it is certainly not worth so many pages of "critical study."

A considerable portion, however, of the work is devoted to the defence of statements made by the author in earlier stages of this unprofitable controversy. For instance, Mr. Archer-Hind in his reply (Classical Review, April, 1889, pp. 181-3) expressly said that he only proposed to deal with accusations of dishonesty; whereupon his critic, assuming that the reply was intended to cover the whole indictment, writes (ib., p. 183):—

"He might be expected, if he felt he had any real case, not to omit nearly all the main issues. In a word, all that concerns the scientific value of the edition considered in itself, apart from its dependence on other books, is practically neglected."

The truth is that most sensible people consider it extremely foolish to answer critics—especially when the attack is savage—and that defence of one's moral character is the only reasonable excuse for a reply. Surely Mr. Cook Wilson must be aware that this is the case, and that consequently the words quoted above embody a most unfair inference. It is to be regretted that in the preface before us there is no apology for this injustice, but, on the contrary, further misrepresentation of the character of Mr. Archer-Hind's answer:—

"The editor's answer, which was disfigured by personalities, was an evasion that amounted to confession. If the charges to which the editor thus referred were his only reason for replying, he was committed to answering them. What he did beside [evading] was to try to discredit my whole review, by trying to show me wrong upon several points which were not relevant to the only issue which, according to his own statement, had moved him to answer. The total effect therefore of his reply was a tacit confession on this issue."

It is curious that Mr. Cook Wilson's words—"apart from its dependence on other books"—quoted above from the Classical Review, p. 183, read like a tacit confession that the "several points" were relevant to the issue selected by "the editor."

Let us examine one or two of the several points. Mr. Cook Wilson wrote in March on 'Timæus,' 66 A:—

"The editor says, 'I have little doubt that ἐχόντων should be read for ἔχοντα. Stallbaum's proposed alterations are the result of his not understanding the construction: ὅσα ἀέρος is parallel to τοῖς γεώδεσι and equivalent to τοῖς ὅσα ἀέρος ἐνεστίν.' It may seem incredible, but it is true, that the emendation is Stallbaum's, and the construction he is supposed not to understand is the very one he gives. 'Itaque legendum fortasse videbitur ἐχόντων &c.' In explanation of this extraordinary circumstance we notice a tendency in the editor to forget benefits and only remember what he thinks mistaken in those on whose notes he is dependent."

"It may seem incredible, but it is true," that the emendation is not Stallbaum's, but Lindau's, and that Mr. Cook Wilson writes: "The reader has but to look at my review to see that the charge of unfairness was not at all that the editor had 'pirated' an emendation of Stallbaum's. I did not even suspect him of it." This disclaimer we accept unreservedly, and therefore are surprised that Mr. Cook Wilson expresses no regret at having used words calculated to convey an erroneous impression. The succeeding sentences, if read carefully and taken literally, tend to correct such an impression; but when a critic who has formulated a grave charge of plagiarism, dealing with an "instance of unfairness," tells us that the editor forgot, it is very natural to suppose that such forgetfulness is neither intended nor expected to be understood literally.

Here is another specimen of Mr. Cook Wilson's method:—

"In one place, Plato's theory of respiration, the editor gives the reader the impression that he has done a piece of original and meritorious research, by using the Greek of a commentary (Galen's) only known in 'a defective Latin translation' when Martin wrote. All that he gets out of the Greek is equally clear in the Latin which is not here defective. All that he rightly gets out of it, and even the illustrative woodcut (a little altered), is already given in the note and translation of the edition used (Daremberg's), to which no acknowledgment is made. We can hardly think the editor has read the Latin: his mistake about it may come from a remark of Daremberg's."—Class. Rev., March, 1889, p. 116/2.

It is surprising to find, on turning to the editor's note, that he has expressly mentioned Daremberg's edition. The alleged mistake about the Latin is nothing but a baseless inference on the part of the critic, due to the fact that Mr. Archer-Hind is courteous enough to suggest that Martin would have had more confidence in the original Greek had it been available, and would, therefore, have followed it more closely than he followed the untrustworthy Latin translation. Of course Martin could not tell that the Latin happened to be trustworthy in this particular place. The words which it seems only fair to explain as above are: "Martin's interpretation. would probably have been modified had the commentary of Galen in the original been before him." This is not the only case in which Mr. Cook Wilson has advanced an allegation of error upon mere suspicion.

It is refreshing to turn to a question of general interest, viz., the construction of the following sentence:—37 A. λέγει (ἡ ψυχὴ) . . . ὅση τ' ἂν τι ταῦτον ἦ καὶ ὅσον ἂν ἕτερον, πρὸς ὅ τι τε μάλιστα καὶ ὅπη καὶ ὅπως καὶ ὅποτε ξυμβαίνει κατὰ τὰ γινόμενά τε πρὸς ἕκαστον ἕκαστα εἶναι καὶ πάσχειν καὶ πρὸς τὰ κατὰ ταῦτα ἔχοντα δέ. With regard to this sentence Mr. Cook Wilson writes:—

"The clause ὅση τ' ἂν τι ταῦτον ἦ καὶ ὅσον ἂν ἕτερον is made an indirect interrogative co-ordinate with πρὸς ὅ τι τε μάλιστα καὶ ὅπη κ.τ.λ., which is impossible. Stallbaum rightly makes the clause a substantive clause and subject of εἶναι or ξυμβαίνει εἶναι."

Mr. Archer-Hind's note on this construction is loosely expressed: "I coincide then with the other interpreters, regarding the whole sentence from ὅση τ' ἂν as indirect interrogation subordinate to λέγει." But his translation is perfectly right, and proves that he understands the subjunctives to be relative subjunctives. The rendering is: "Tells that wherewith the thing is same and that wherefrom it is different, and in what relation or place or manner or time it comes to pass both in the region of the changing and in the region of the changeless that each thing affects another and is affected." The relative subjunctive in such a sentence might be well illustrated by 'Sophist,' 262 E, ὅσον δ' ἂν ὁ λόγος ἦ, σύ μοι φράζειν. The variation of construction is, of course, perfectly legitimate, and is in this place not ineffective.

Mr. Archer-Hind tells us in his preface, the "principal object of this edition is to examine the philosophical significance of the dialogue and its bearings on the Platonic system." This being the case, Mr. Cook Wilson's pamphlet is, to a great extent, the play without Hamlet, as he is not "ready with the parts which treat of the philosophy and what may conveniently be called the scientific subjects in the 'Timæus.'" However, he has given a sample of his treatment of this department (pp. 129-45), one point of which is here submitted to the judgment of our readers:—

"In the Classical Review the editor's note on the motions of Venus and Mercury was cited as a case where he puts forward a theory, which from his manner would be thought new, though it is far from being so. There are two main explanations of the words ἐναντίαν εἰληχότας αὐτῷ δύνανται. The first is, that Plato supposes the planets Mercury and Venus to revolve in a direction opposite to that of the sun, and explains in this way the fact that these planets are sometimes in advance of the sun (in the direction of the apparent rotation of the heavens) and sometimes behind it. According to the second theory the ἐναντία δύναμις does not refer to a difference in direction of revolution. The difference supposed to be meant is, that the two planets show a variation in their orbits, due to what is called retrogradation, to which the sun is not liable. The editor speaks of the first theory, which he rejects, as if it were the usual one—'These words are usually understood to mean that Venus and Mercury revolve in a direction contrary to that of the sun.' He introduces the second, with which he agrees, in a way which might make the reader suppose it was its first appearance in literature."

Mr. Archer-Hind's note on this passage (38 D) shows that his theory differs in a very important particular from the one with which Mr. Cook Wilson asserts that he (Mr. Archer-Hind) agrees. Let our readers endeavour to reconcile the statements contained in the preceding quotation with the following passage:—

"The truth is, as I believe, that Plato meant the sun to share the contrary motion of Venus and Mercury in relation to the other four planets. It is quite natural, seeing that the sun and the orbits of Venus and Mercury are encircled by the orbit of the earth, while Plato supposed them all to revolve about the earth, that he should class them together apart from the four whose orbits really do encircle that of the earth: his observations would very readily lead him to attributing to these three a motion contrary to the rest; but there seems nothing which could possibly have induced him to class the sun apart from the two inferior planets."

The notion that the sun shares the "contrary motion" is, at any rate, novel and ingenious. We do not pronounce further upon its merits, as it is enough to have shown that Mr. Archer-Hind is justified in making the reader suppose that his view of the "contrary motion" had not appeared before in literature.

It would be easy to multiply instances which make this diatribe a monument of everything from which a critic should shrink; but it is better to bring a distasteful task to a close. Enough has been quoted to show that Prof. Cook Wilson's animadversions may, in some cases at least, be taken with reserve. Specimens of captious and trivial fault-finding are to be found pp. 14, 15, § 4; p. 17 on 21 B; p. 87, § 52; pp. 132 ff., § 66.

But apart from the character of this or that item of detailed criticism, Prof. Cook Wilson's treatment of Mr. Archer-Hind's work is to be condemned. For the alleged instances of error and unfairness are not typical, and ought not to affect appreciably a general estimate of Mr. Archer-Hind's achievement, much less ought they to be made the excuse for sweeping charges of incompetence and dishonesty; while the writer's almost entire silence as to the positive merits of Mr. Archer-Hind's commentary is as unjust as explicit detraction. The affectation of fairness, as in § 64 (in which two trivial points are selected for faint and qualified commendation), makes bad worse. Even if we accept all the deductions which a severe scrutiny can suggest, we are still free to acknowledge the brilliant style and general accuracy of Mr. Archer-Hind's translation, and the abundance of original thought displayed in his commentary, and in the introductory essay on the philosophy of the "Timæus."

The French Revolution. By Justin H. MacCarthy, M.P. Vols. I. and II. (Chatto & Windus.)

MR. JUSTIN H. MACCARTHY dedicates his two sturdy volumes on the French Revolution to his father, and the tribute is well deserved, for as historians both of them belong to the circulating library school. Mr. J. H. MacCarthy inherits his father's love of picturesque incidents, his hardihood of assertion, and his use of sensational headings for chapters and pages—"regumque turres," "how will Berry pull through?" and so forth. To these characteristics Mr. Justin H. MacCarthy adds a style peculiarly his own, which, to put it mildly, hardly errs on the side of restraint. Its abundance of literary allusions, taken from a range of authors which includes alike Herodotus and Ibsen, has hardly been equalled even by Ouida. Its phraseology is marked by Gallicisms like "taken at the foot of the letter" and "he took the key of the fields," no less than by slang purely British, such as "toeing the line" and "a put-up job." The leisurely reader can, if he pleases, amuse himself, as he goes along, by counting the number of characters who are described as "esurient" or as being "whistled down the wind." But only one character is represented as having been "the stormy petrel of his party's suicide," and he must certainly have been an odd sort of person.

Mr. MacCarthy does not entitle his volumes a history of the French Revolution, and the omission, whether intentional or unintentional, is to be commended. As a history of that cataclysm they would be ludicrously inadequate; as a portrait gallery of people who played prominent and subordinate parts in the Revolution they have merits of the popular sort. Mr. MacCarthy is deficient in discrimination, but he has plenty of vigour, and can dash off a good impressionist sketch of a man of action, for example De Boufflers. Nor does he altogether fail with some of his men of reflection, Condorcet for instance. But he has overcrowded his stage with mere utility actors, and his readers may in the end weary of biographical details beginning with "Born on the 10th of January, 1752," and including descriptions of "that curious sloping forehead and long nose, those thick lips, that retreating chin, that large sleepy eye with its vague air of speculation." Mr. MacCarthy constantly informs us that So-and-so was little dreaming of the guillotine that was awaiting him, which is true enough,

— because
It was not yet in sight.

And he inserts in his pages some tales of dubious authenticity. There seem to be some grounds for believing that the Neckers offered their daughter, afterwards Madame de Staël, in marriage to William Pitt. The story, which is inaccurately reproduced by Mr. MacCarthy, was, however, disputed by Lord Stanhope, who pointed out that there is no reason for believing that Pitt ever saw Mlle. Necker; that Horace Walpole, the supposed intermediary, was certainly not at Paris when Pitt visited the city; and that the theatrical reply, "I am already married to my country," is quite unlike any recorded saying of the English statesman's. Another story of legendary or quasi-legendary character is that Lafayette it was who proposed in the Assembly of Notables the convocation of the Estates General. There is far more reason for connecting that momentous suggestion with the Abbé Sabatier. Mr. MacCarthy withholds for the present his characters of some of the Jacobin leaders. But there is a significant warning that Mr. Morley's study of Robespierre is not to be allowed to hold the field:—

"Mr. Morley seems to be endowed with a fatal unreadiness to admire anything or anybody in the past except the writings of Mr. Burke and Mr. Burke himself. He is particularly bitter against Robespierre, partly, we cannot help feeling, because, having been so often himself accused of revolutionary sympathies, he wishes to show how scrupulously impartial, how finely analytical he can be in dealing with a great revolutionary."

Mr. Morley's reputation will not be materially affected by this attack.

"Dramatic sympathy," says Mr. MacCarthy, while rebuking Mr. Morley, "is one of the most essential qualities, if it is not the most essential quality, for the proper appreciation of history." The remark may possibly be taken to imply that he did mean after all to write a history of the French Revolution. But there are other qualities which go to make a competent historian, and with some of these Mr. MacCarthy is by no means endowed. He is unable, for instance, to see the relative importance of things. In his account of the events anterior to 1789 he devotes three whole chapters to the affair of the diamond necklace, and a good deal of space to the rise of Freemasonry, which appears to him an event of momentous significance. This is a dramatic conception of history with a vengeance, but it is drama of the Palais Royal stamp, like 'The Candidate,' which Mr. MacCarthy made familiar to English audiences. Not much exception can be taken to his account of the literary antecedents of the French Revolution, though it is possible to exaggerate their importance. But he has little to say, except in connexion with Jansenism, about the resistance to the royal authority on the part of the Paris Parliament, though that resistance was extremely important. Still less does he dwell upon the effect of the American rebellion in accelerating the French Revolution. But if the teaching of Rousseau is to be found in that passage in the Declaration of the Rights of Man in which it was asserted that all men were created equal, no less is the teaching of the events across the Atlantic to be found in the change that came over French society after France had cast in her lot with the United States. Lafayette remarked that a principle of national sovereignty had been announced which they would soon hear of at home. And Arthur Young's shrewd comment was: "The American Revolution has laid the foundation of another in France if Government does not take care of itself."

By far too gloomy a description is given by Mr. MacCarthy of the condition of France previous to the convocation of the Estates General. "He who did not live before 1789," said Talleyrand, "has never known the charm of life"; and though Talleyrand was doubtless thinking of his own order, it is certain that France as a whole was by no means in such desperate straits as apologists for the Revolution are wont to assert. The peace of 1783 secured for France a distinct ascendancy in Europe. It was followed by a period of some prosperity, during which Arthur Young tells us that French trade was nearly doubled. The financial position was bad, but, if financial reformers had been allowed a free hand, by no means desperate. Nor is it clear that had Turgot possessed greater tact or Calonne been more competent, the monarchy might not have been saved at the eleventh hour. John Adams thought that the throne was more stable in France than in England, and it is probably an anachronism to regard Marie Antoinette as having been unpopular throughout the reign. Mr. MacCarthy perceives that there was a Liberal party among the noblesse, but he hardly seems aware how far the whole class had gone in the direction of reforms or how far they were prepared to go. The Assembly of the Notables, as every one knows, abolished the corvée; the cahiers of the nobles elected to the Estates General show that numbers of them were ready to abandon their exemption from direct taxation, to accept compensation for their feudal rights, and to throw open the higher ranks of the army to commoners. These would have been great surrenders.

In his chapters on the state of the French peasantry Mr. MacCarthy has done little more than reproduce Arthur Young, or rather the more trenchant passages of Arthur Young's familiar indictment of the old régime. No doubt the lot of a peasant under the feudal system in France was not to be envied. He was constantly liable to dues and services that were always vexatious and often actually oppressive; he was ground down by taxation, and in a bad year ran considerable risk of starvation. But there were alleviating circumstances, and these Mr. MacCarthy does not sufficiently take into account. The French peasant was at least better off than the peasant in Germany, where serfdom was still general. In a large part of France—possibly a third, and certainly a fifth—he was already proprietor of his own land. In portions of Languedoc, Dauphiné, and Lyonnais much land was allodial—that is, held directly from the king. Everywhere the feudal burdens were being alleviated or becoming obsolete—including the silence des grenouilles, if it ever existed—or were confined by the law courts to cases in which they were authorized by title-deeds. In short, there is plausibility in the view that had the system of taxation been altered the French landed system might have been left to reform itself, and, as Mr. MacCarthy laments the impassioned prejudice which has governed previous writers on the French Revolution, he should at any rate have pointed out that the old order was not wholly bad.

In the present volumes Mr. MacCarthy has only brought his narrative down to the fall of the Bastille, which may be considered to have closed the first act of the Revolution proper. His purely descriptive chapters are good, and his pages on the taking of the Bastille are not the less satisfactory because he honestly confesses that the task of reconciling the hopelessly conflicting accounts of the attack is beyond him. But his treatment of constitutional questions leaves much to be desired. He heaps ridicule on the nobles and clergy for refusing to amalgamate with the commons. Yet the privileged orders may fairly have hesitated before placing the country under the guidance of a single Chamber. As Necker saw, but as he had not the courage to propose, the simplest remedy would have been a division of the Deputies into two Chambers. It may be doubted, indeed, if the compromise would have been accepted by those who were prepared to deal with old institutions in the spirit of the first question in Sieyès's famous pamphlet, "What is the Third Estate? Everything." None the less constitutional monarchy was attainable, and the blame for its non-accomplishment is not to be wholly laid to the charge of Polignac and D'Antraigues. These and similar considerations would inevitably have occurred to the sober historian, but Mr. MacCarthy is hardly that. He has chosen a great subject, and he has treated it with a gusto which is not without power to captivate the reader. But the permanent value of his volumes is slight, as they are lacking in scholarship and thought.

NOVELS OF THE WEEK.

The New Faith. By Charles T. C. James. 3 vols. (Ward & Downey.)

The Way of Transgressors. By E. Rentoul Esler. 3 vols. (Sampson Low & Co.)

Ada Triscott. By Capt. Andrew Haggard, D.S.O. 2 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)

A Man of Mark. By Anthony Hope. (Remington & Co.)

Is the material—we are inclined to ask—of 'The New Faith' better or worse than the manner? For ourselves we prefer the material, for if Mr. James has a style it is probably a bad style; but he appears to have a good deal to say—of a kind. To use a constantly recurring expression of one of his own characters, the book may be said to have more "bottom" than is always found in three-volume literature. But when this is allowed it is after all more like diluted Dickens than anything else; it has Dickens's vices of exaggeration and the rest, but how little of his virtues! Mr. James is inclined to carry portrait-painting to the verge of caricature, especially the painting of people who, to put it mildly, do not engage his sympathies. The parson of this story is a case in point, and a most unpleasant specimen. And then the author has certain "stops" at his command, which he cannot resist using, not occasionally, but frequently. One of the heroines, for instance, is called again and again "The Very Purest Gold," and then the unhappy reader becomes aware that her golden hair is going to make "the outline of her forehead dim." He also knows when "the old flood" is going to rise and bear away the leader of the New Faith "with a passionate intensity." This leader is a young man with a magnetic manner, and the irresistible name of Cecil Avernol; his disciples are taught to call him by both names without a prefix. He is well born, well bred, eloquent and fiery; but we are sorry to note that he uses "lay" for lie, and talks of "positioned" where other people say placed; and "never hardly" also occurs, if not in his conversation, in that of some one else. It appears, too, that Cecil—not Plato—invented the twin-soul business. What we may think of the New Faith as a religion is not to the point, but we think little of Cecil himself as a leader or a lover. In spite, or by reason, of the magnetic manner, he seems to have been as blind as a bat, and a real bore. A man who habitually neglects his dinner, and is then snappish and "tetchy" with his best friends, may be excused on the score of indigestion, but it is not easy to make him seem heroic. Edith is nice and goddess-like, but a rather monotonous being, and so slavish in her devotion to Cecil that, given his temperament, one almost forgives him for calling her "stout" when discussing her with a female friend. Just when the grand climax of the new venture is approaching, and

Cecil is about to pronounce the last word which is supposed to be at once the key-stone and the ratification of the movement, he is stricken down with paralysis, and ultimately takes to playing with gold-fish, leaving the reader not so much lamenting as wondering at it all.

A pleasant, casual story, sufficiently moral in its aim, full of gossip and detail, is 'The Way of Transgressors.' There is any number of virtuous people in it, as well as the transgressors; and, to tell the truth, the way of the virtuous people is just as hard as that of the transgressors. If the story were intended to point a moral above all things, it would be rather a failure, and perhaps none the less in harmony with facts on that account; for the best and strongest characters suffer the most. However, the superlatively bad character, who is as natural in his badness as most of the others are in their goodness, suffers thoroughly for his sins, and this must be a satisfaction to the well-balanced mind. On the whole, 'The Way of Transgressors' is a decidedly good novel, marked by much quiet power and grace. It is not altogether impertinent to add that the texts for the chapters have been admirably chosen. There are old-fashioned readers who set much store by their mottoes, poetical and otherwise; and Mr., Mrs., or Miss Esler has catered for such readers with considerable success.

There is so much that is good to be said of 'Ada Triscott' that a critic is justified in beginning with its faults. Capt. Haggard's weak point is construction. The chronology of the story is not well arranged, and the nominal heroine's first marriage is worked up into something of an anti-climax. Ada Triscott may fairly be called the nominal heroine, for the reader's sympathy is throughout with Nellie Watson. That sympathy is gradually but unmistakably urged on in an ascending scale through all her long renunciation of her lover for that lover's happiness. This part of the story is remarkably artistic, and we should be inclined to pronounce it perfect art but that the fascination fails at the culminating point, and Nellie, who till then has been most human and lovable, suddenly becomes theatrical, and ceases to be dramatic. Yet in spite of this weakness 'Ada Triscott' is a better novel than ninety-nine out of every hundred published, and is so great an improvement on 'Dodo and I' (Capt. Haggard's last story) that it is reasonable to anticipate that the next novel from the same pen will give Capt. Haggard a considerable position among living novelists.

Anthony Hope has chosen his subject, surroundings, characters, and incidents very happily. His scene is laid in the Republic of Aureataland, in South America, and his "Man of Mark" is the President of the Republic, General Marcus W. Whittingham. In fact there are three men of mark, for "the Colonel" of the Republican army contrives a revolution, and the manager of an English bank, who tells the diverting narrative, tries to make the best of both these worthies. The three clever rascals are all in love with a certain signorina, who is in love with herself and her money. The plots, the revolution, and the love-making are described with considerable skill, and the whole story is as entertaining in its light way as anybody could wish. The idea of chronicling the convulsions of a diminutive sovereign state is by no means a new one in the pages of fiction; but Anthony Hope is not without justification for having repeated the experiment. He does not make everything seem natural and probable, but the illusion is quite strong enough for the drift and manner of the narrative. The President and the signorina are particularly vigorous creations.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

LORD DUNDONALD has reissued, with some omissions, his famous grandfather's Autobiography of a Seaman (Bentley), with a sequel which fills about a fourth of the volume, and reviews the half of the veteran sailor's life which he did not himself live to chronicle. All that good print and paper, and especially a number of very spirited and well-executed engravings, could do to make this cheap book attractive has been lavishly done. In it, however, is continued the fault that prevented the work on which it is based from becoming the naval classic it deserved to be. It was Lord Cochrane's misfortune, in great measure due to his own infirmity, that while he was in the English service he never had a chance of commanding a great fleet and striking an overwhelming blow at the enemy; but in guerilla warfare on the sea he showed himself the equal of Drake and all the foremost heroes of the Elizabethan age. His exploits in the Speedy, a sloop of fourteen guns, and the Pallas, a frigate of thirty-two guns, are without a parallel since the days of the Hind and the Revenge; and while he was in the Chilean and Brazilian service he showed equal valour and equal skill in overcoming difficulties on a somewhat larger scale. But his fearless independence and his unconquerable belief in himself—which was never belied by his achievements under fire—made him nearly as obnoxious to those who employed him as to those he was sent to attack. On this account, and most ungenerously, he was kicked out of the English navy; and it was pretty much the same after he undertook to render, and actually rendered, splendid services to the South American states in their revolt against Portuguese and Spanish oppression. He was always quarrelling with his employers, and always exposing himself to insults and injuries. It is not strange that he should have felt bitterly the injustice he thus had to endure, and this side of his career is an instructive, if a painful study. But by obtruding his grievances as much as he did in his 'Autobiography' and in his now almost forgotten 'Narrative of Services in Chili and Peru' he sadly weakened the interest of those books for general readers, and did much to eclipse his greatness as a fighting sailor. It is a pity that the present Lord Dundonald has worked in the same spirit. By ignoring out-of-date controversies and personalities of the past, he might have reduced this volume by at least a third, and might have added immensely to its charm, for grown-up readers as well as for schoolboys, as a record of adventure and heroism.

THE collection of nursery tales brought together under the title of True Courage, and other Stories (Remington & Co.), has been printed and bound so as to resemble a novel for the circulating libraries. There is, perhaps, no reason why this should not have been done. The solid appearance and good type are appropriate to the solidity and goodness of the stories, which young people will be inclined to commend to each other as fairly sensible and attractive, though the novel-reader who takes up the book on the strength of its similarity to other novels may be entitled to complain. Royston Keith tells his stories precisely as a boy of seventeen writing down to a boy of fifteen would naturally tell them, especially if the afflatus came upon him after a course of such reading as boys used to delight in forty or fifty years ago—in the 'Moral Class Book,' the 'Children's Friend,' and other volumes of the same description.

THE Cantor Lectures on the Decoration and Illustration of Books (Trousne) were delivered to the Society of Arts by Mr. Walter Crane, and are now published in a convenient form, and accompanied by cuts reproducing some of the most characteristic examples of an artist whose success and ability in the matter eminently qualify him to instruct others. Mr. Crane deals both with the historical and the theoretical aspects of his subject. What he says about the latter is necessarily of more value than his remarks upon the former, in dealing with which he has had many able and accomplished forerunners, whose opportunities for study were much greater than his. In discussing the theory of book decoration and its application in the enrichment of pages, Mr. Crane dilates with taste and care on the proper spacing of typography and cuts, on the decorative value of initial letters in ancient MSS., on the principles—if so they may be called—which prevailed in book illustration and decoration from the sixteenth century to the nineteenth; he points out with much force the injurious effects of Renaissance traditions, and the inharmonious combination of copper-plates with type-printing. He very wisely insists upon the decline of heraldry as a decoration when men, ridiculously ignorant of the art they practised, attempted to express the abstract ideas of the ancient heralds by means of naturalistic designs, which might or might not be like nature, but expressed no ideas at all. A modern revival of this folly has escaped the attention of the lecturer. Mr. Crane lays much stress on the profound difference between decoration proper and art pictorial as applied to books, and he illustrates it with several instances from Hogarth, Blake, Turner, Northcote, and Doré, to Rossetti and others. We think that by not mentioning them he undervalues the merit and influence of John Leech and Sir John Millais. He holds sound though unpopular views on the not wholly profitable influence of Japanese decorations, which, of course, are artistic only in a limited degree; and he justly denies to the people of the Island Empire "real constructive power of design and satisfactory filling of spaces," so that they "do not furnish fine examples of page decoration as a rule"; and, as might be expected from an artist so thoroughly imbued with the logic of the art of which he is a master, Mr. Crane is evidently not enamoured with the so-called "American development of wood engraving," which is pictorial in a certain sense, but not truly decorative. He is mistaken if he means us to infer that what he calls the "card-basket style," in which little cuts are scattered over pages of type or jumbled over one another, is due to the Transatlantic draughtsmen. George Bickham applied it to plates more than a hundred years ago. The noble decorative designs of Mr. Elihu Vedder receive honourable mention from Mr. Crane, who concludes by exhibiting some of his own book decorations.

WE have received from Messrs. Sonnenschein & Co. Bismarck and State Socialism, by Mr. W. H. Dawson. This volume is not a complete work on State Socialism; but it is a very complete work on Prince Bismarck's social policy, and from that point of view most interesting. It is purely German, and does not discuss the developments of State Socialism in Switzerland and in Australia, or our attempts in the United Kingdom in the same direction. But readers of many kinds will find a good deal that is new to them in the book. Mr. Dawson's style is, perhaps, here and there a little German, and we note the statement that there existed formerly in one part of Germany a monopoly in "Whig making." That this is not an allusion to a development of Liberal Unionism, or indeed of any political movement, is clear from the fact that the "Whig-making" monopoly is associated with monopolies in shaving and hair cutting. Mr. Dawson mentions German extensions of territory in Somali Land in such a way as to imply that what is commonly called Somali Land is German, though in the ordinary sense of the word Somali Land is a nominal British protectorate.

M. L. THOUVENEL, whose 'Le Secret de l'Empereur' we not long ago reviewed, now publishes La Grèce du Roi Othon (through M. Calmann Lévy), a work which forms a history of the struggle for mastery between England and France at Athens, 1846-9. The most interesting thing in the book is the account of the way in which M. Thouvenel senior took the fall of the Orleans monarchy when he was serving it abroad.

VARIOUS works of reference lie on our table. The most important of these are the Medical Register and the Dentists' Register (Spottiswoode), which from their official character are thoroughly trustworthy.—The Calendar and a Supplement to the Calendar, a volume containing the examination papers of the Royal University of Ireland (Dublin, Thom & Co.), are also before us. We are sorry to see that the evil system of set books prevails to so large an extent in the University.—The Civil Service Calendar (Allen & Co.) is intended to supply information to candidates for appointments in the Civil Service and hints on the mode of encountering the examiners. From the same publishers comes London in 1890, the late Mr. Fry's excellent handbook brought down to date.—That useful work Low's Handbook to the Charities of London (Low & Co.) has appeared for the fifty-fourth time. The striking decline in the income of London charities is duly noted, and also their activity in building.

THREE books about Mary Stuart appeared last year; and here we have yet two more, Marie Stuart: L'Œuvre Puritaine, le Proci, le Supplice, by the Baron Kervyn de Lettenhove, 2 vols. (Paris, Perrin), and The Trial, Execution, and Death of Mary Queen of Scots, by Charles Daek (Northampton, Taylor). The first contains 1,003 pages, and deals with only the last two years of her life. It thus picks up the story where Mr. Leader dropped it in his 'Mary Queen of Scots in Captivity,' a work reviewed by us in 1881. The principal events of those two years were Babington's conspiracy and the execution at Fotheringhay. To the ordinary student of history both are chiefly known through Mr. Froude's narrative, to which, rather strangely, M. de Lettenhove barely once makes reference. State papers, published and unpublished, the Hatfield and other collections, Camden's 'Annals of the Reign of Elizabeth,' and the works of Prince Labanoff and Father Morris, are his leading authorities. As a rule, he cites them exactly; still, here and there one lights on such vague references as "contemporary pamphlet," "Strangvage," and "Miss Strickland." With the articles "Babington," "Ballard," "Gifford," &c., in the 'Dictionary of National Biography' he seems to be unacquainted. This is a pity, the more so as on many essential points he is widely at variance with Mr. S. L. Lee. For instance, according to the latter, Gifford's flight to Paris took place on the 29th of July, Ballard's arrest on the 4th of August, and Babington's not till towards the close of the month. According to M. de Lettenhove—and rightly, it seems—the dates should be the 31st of July, 14th of August, and 24th of August, or in each case ten days earlier by the old style. Mr. Lee allows Babington several days of irresolution; as a matter of fact, it is as certain that Babington's flight took place on the very evening of Ballard's arrest as it is that he changed clothes with Savage, and not "with a friend who lived at Westminster." The importance of exact dates in tracing an intricate conspiracy can hardly be over-estimated; in this all-important respect M. de Lettenhove himself is not always too scrupulous, e.g., in his account of Mary's removal to Tixall. An ardent Mariolat, he contends, like Prince Labanoff, that all the passages incriminating the Scottish queen in a plot to murder Elizabeth are forgeries, interpolated by Philipps in the Babington correspondence; and Mary's execution he regards as the climax of deep-laid machinations of the Puritans. Neither can this be called novel; indeed, in all the two volumes there is nothing, perhaps, more striking than the suggestion that Oliver Cromwell, uncle to the Protector, was probably present as captain of the Huntingdonshire militia at the execution of Charles I.'s grandmother. The English quotations are printed with unusual accuracy, though on p. 142 "inveigh" occurs for inveigle; on p. 224, "as seeming" for or deeming; and on p. 269, "lasest peop le" for basest people; whilst on p. 311 "arraigned" is mistranslated for torturée. Actual blunders are few, and rarely vital to the argument. "A celebrated Puritan" is a curious gloss on "Martin Mar-Prelate"; Harrow, of course, was founded by John Lyon, and not by a Bellamy; the fable of Essex and the ring is a seventeenth century coinage; Edward IV. did not murder Henry VII.; nor is it true that, according to English custom, Walsingham's corpse could have been arrested by his creditors. That the Casket Letters were forged by Elizabeth's agents is a graver misstatement; still, the work as a whole is one of enormous industry and considerable worth. If ever the man arise with courage and patience to essay a new life of Queen Mary that shall condense all the vast stores of fresh information about her, he will owe not a little to M. de Lettenhove. An outcome of the Peterborough Exhibition of 1887, Mr. Dack's little pamphlet, only forty-four pages long, is as valuable as it is brief. It prints Robert Wingfield's letter to Walsingham, describing the execution at Fotheringhay, of which three days before he had been an eyewitness (see Notes and Queries, Seventh Series, vol. iv. p. 361). The little dog, the marvellous ageing of the severed head, and the stirring of the dead lips—all these we have here once more, with much besides, as a minute description of Queen Mary's dress (no blood-red underclothing) and personal appearance—"of stature tall and bodie corpulent, round shouldered, her face fat and broad, doble chinned and hazell eyes, her borrowed haire auborne." Dean Fletcher's entry in the Peterborough Cathedral register describing the funeral, though less interesting, was still well worth printing. The eight illustrations are, for the most part, extremely poor.

We have on our table An Outline of the Law of Property, by T. Raleigh (Oxford, Clarendon Press).—The Passion Play at Ober-Ammergau, with the whole Drama translated into English, by the Author of 'Charles Lowder' (Allen & Co.).—Browning's Message to his Time, by E. Berdoe (Sonnenschein).—My Illustrated Diary of a Voyage from London to Australia, by Hume Nisbet ('My Diary' Publishing Company).—Local Government in Wisconsin, by D. E. Spencer (Baltimore, U.S., Johns Hopkins University).—Thomas Jefferson's Views on Public Education, by J. C. Henderson (Putnam).—A German Reader for Beginners in School or College, with Notes and Vocabulary, by E. S. Joynes (Boston, U.S., Heath).—Cycles of Drought and Good Seasons in South Africa, by D. E. Hutchins (Weale & Son).—British Fossils and Where to Seek Them, by J. W. Williams (Sonnenschein).—Forty Lessons in Carpentry Workshop Practice, by C. F. Mitchell, revised by G. C. Pope (Cassell).—The Principles and Progress of Printing Machinery, by J. Southward (Menken).—A State Iniquity: its Rise, Extension, and Overthrow, by B. Scott (Kegan Paul & Co.).—Hymns for Elementary Schools and Others, compiled by W. L. Rooper and D. Hume (Griffith & Farran).—Polo in India, by Capt. G. J. Younghusband (Allen & Co.).—The Advertiser's Guardian, 1890, by Louis Collins (Collins).—Strayed East, by the Rev. A. R. Buckland ('Church Monthly' Office).—Dorothy's Vocation, by E. E. Green (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier).—For the Good of the Family, by Kate Eyre (Digby & Long).—Six to One, by E. Bellamy (Putnam).—The Evil that Men Do, by E. Fawcett (New York, Belford Company).—The Waverley Proverbial Birthday Book (Remington).—Sir Thomas Wyatt and his Poems, by W. E. Simonds (Kegan Paul & Co.).—The Backslider, and other Poems, by Anteus (E. Mathews).—The Poems of W. Leighton (Stock).—Memorials of Edwin Hatch, D.D., edited by his Brother (Hodder & Stoughton).—The Ministry of Preaching, by Mgr. Félix Dupanloup, translated by S. J. Eales (Griffith & Farran).—Rejected of Men, Poems, by A. Johnson-Brown (Low).—The Servant of the Lord, in Isaiah xl.-lxvi., by J. Forbes, D.D. (Edinburgh, T. & T. Clark).—What is Truth? by "Nemo" (Kegan Paul & Co.).—Supernatural Revelation, by C. M. Mead, D.D. (New York, Randolph).—Les Artistes Célèbres: Hobbema, by E. Michel (Librairie de 'L'Art').—De la Vie Intime des Dogmes et de leur Puissance d'Évolution, by A. Sabatier (Paris, Fischbacher).—Cœur Muet, by Mlle. Zénaïde Fleuriot (Hachette).—Studien zur Geschichte Galiläas, by A. Kaminka (Berlin, Engel).—Geschichtsdramen, by P. Lohmann (Leipzig, Weber).—Litteræ Quædam Theologica de Sacramentorum Virtute, quas ad R. P. Magistrum Fr. A. Lepidi dedit Sacerdos Quidam Hibernus (Dublin, Weldrick).—and Travaux de la Deuxième Assemblée Générale de l'Association Protestante pour l'Étude Pratiques Questions Sociales (Nutt).

LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

ENGLISH.

- Theology.*
Butler's (A. R.) The Promised King, or the Story of the Children's Saviour, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Day's (M. F.) The Thirty-nine Articles of Religion Explained, &c., cr. 8vo. 5/ cl.
Fetherston's (W.) The New Symbols, or Suggestions as to Future Divine Punishment, 12mo. 2/ cl.
God in His World, an Interpretation, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
Meredith's (F.) Is Christ Divided? Sectarianism and Unification, cr. 8vo. 2/ cl.
Law.
Edmunds (L.) and Renton's (A. W.) Law and Practice of Letters Patent, royal 8vo. 3/ cl.
Poetry and the Drama.
Ibsen's Prose Dramas, Vol. 3, 12mo. 3/6
History and Biography.
Eggleston's (E.) First Book in American History, 4/8 cl.
Gambetta (Léon), Life of, by F. T. Marzials, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl. (Statesman Series.)
Geography and Travel.
Brayshaw's (G. R.) Special Surveyed Roads in Scotland, being a Guide for Cyclists, &c., cr. 8vo. 5/ cl.
Buckland's (F. O.) Health Springs of Germany and Austria, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Park (Mungo) and the Niger, by J. Thomson, cr. 8vo. 4/8 cl.
Philology.
Oliver's (J.) Models for Latin Prose Composition, cr. 8vo. 3/6
Science.
Bennett's (C.) The Modern Malady, or Sufferers from "Nerves", cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
Bodington's (A.) Studies in Evolution and Biology, 5/ cl.
Dana's (J. D.) Characteristics of Volcanoes, roy. 8vo. 18/ cl.
Haslück's (F. N.) Wood and Metal Turning, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Lankaster's (E. R.) The Advancement of Science, Occasional Essays and Addresses, 8vo. 10/8 cl.
Owen's (E.) Selected Subjects in connexion with Surgery of Infancy and Childhood, 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Roney's (T.) Supplement to the Student's Plane Trigonometry, cr. 8vo. 7/6 cl.
General Literature.
Blackmore's (R. D.) Mary Anierley, cheap edition, cr. 8vo. 2/ Buchanan's (A. W.) An Evangel of Hope, cr. 8vo. 4/8 cl.
Cave's (L.) Scenes in the Life of a Sailor, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Cloudeley's (H.) Pastor Thoughts of a Working Man, 4/6 Labour, cr. 8vo. 2/8 cl.
Fenn's (G. M.) Black Blood, cr. 8vo. 2/ bds.
Firmstone's (G. W. H.) The Mystery of Crowther Castle, and other Stories, cr. 8vo. 2/ cl.
Gift's (T.) Dishonoured, 3 vols. cr. 8vo. 31/8 cl.
Home Handicrafts, edited by C. Peters, imp. 16mo. 2/6 cl.
Lamb's Adventures of Ulysses, with Introduction by A. Lang, roy. 16mo. 2/8 cl. gilt.
Molesworth's (Mrs.) Twelve Tiny Tales, imp. 16mo. 2/6 cl.
Pendleton's (J.) Newspaper Reporting in Olden Time and To-day, 12mo. 4/8 cl.
Phillips (F. C.) and Willis's (C. J.) The Fatal Phryne, 2/ bds.
Stables's (G.) The Mystery of a Millionaire's Grave, 6/ cl.
Todd (J.) and Whall's (W. B.) Practical Seamanship, 21/ cl.
Tragedy of Captain Harrison, or the Brownlow Street Mystery, by R. C. J., cr. 8vo. 3/8 cl.
Verner's (Capt. W.) The First British Rifle Corps, cr. 8vo. 5/

FOREIGN.

Theology.

- Hefele (C. J. v.): Conciliengeschichte, fortgesetzt v. Hergenrother, Vol. 9, 10m.
Hofmeister (G.): Bernhard v. Clairvaux, Part 2, 1m.
Maybaum (S.): Jüdische Homiletik, 8m. 60.
Völter (D.): Die Komposition der Paulinischen Hauptbriefe, Vol. 1, 2m. 40.

Fine Art and Archaeology.

- Attischen (Die) Grabreliefs, hrsg. v. A. Conze, Part 1, 60m.
Haupt (A.): Die Baukunst der Renaissance in Portugal, Vol. 1, 13m.
Hernani, avec quinze Compositions par Michelena, 40fr.
Locella (G.): Dante in der Deutschen Kunst, Parts 2-6, 25m.

Philosophy.

- Stiborius: Die Kategorien der Sinnlichen Perception, 2m.
History and Biography.
Beauregard (C. de): La Guerre de la Vendée, 1793-6, Mémoires de la Classe, de la Boue, 7fr. 50.
Correspondance du Cte. Pozzo di Borgo et du Cte. de Nesselrode, Vol. 1, 1814-1818, 7fr. 50.
Lubomirski (Prince): Histoire Contemporaine, Vol. 2, 7fr. 50.
Robiquet (P.): Le Personnel Municipal de Paris pendant la Révolution, 7fr. 50.

Geography and Travel.

- Carlos (Marquise de San): Les Américains chez Eux, 3fr. 50.

Philology.

- Croiset (A. et M.): Histoire de la Littérature Grecque, Vol. 2, 8fr.
Hofer (U.): Konon, Text u. Quellenuntersuchg., 2m. 80.

General Literature.

- Bornier (H. de): Louise de Vauvert, 3fr. 50.
Fischer (K.): Goethe-Schriften, Vol. 3, 8m.
Hennebert (Lieut.-Col.): De Paris à Tombouctou en huit Jours, 3fr. 50.
Maugras (G.): Les Demoiselles de Verrières, 5fr.

EPITAPH ON MARY BOYLE.

(WRITTEN WHILE SHE LIVED.)

Πῶς ἐπικήδειον τεύξω σοί, πότνια, θρήνον, ἢ παρέδωκε χάριτες ὥσιν ἀειθαλέες;
ἡ βόσσαν ψυχὴν τὴν ἀν' οὐκ ἀγάσαιο νεάνις, φαίδρωπὸν τ' ὄψιν φαίδροτέρων τε νέων;
οἶσθα, σοφὴ, σπουδαία γελοῖά τε δεξιὰ τ' εἰπεῖν, οὐχ ὕβρει χαίροντο; ἄλλ' ἀγαναφροσύνῃ ἀσπασίη πολλοῖσιν, ἐτὴ μάλα πολλὰ ἐτι θάλλοις ὥς νῦν, χάρμα φίλοις, εἶτα ποθεινότητι.
E. L. L.

COLERIDGE AND THE ANTI-JACOBINS.

BESIDES the collection of the 'Poetry' of the Anti-Jacobin, a reprint of which you noticed the other day, there appeared in the same year (1799) its 'Beauties,' which included some prose as well as the verse. The 'Poetry' was a mere reprint with the original notes, but the 'Beauties' seems to have been an independent affair, for it not only included prose rejected from the octavo reprint of the "complete" 'Anti-Jacobin' (2 vols. 1799), but was supplied with some fresh notes by the editor, who says he trusts that his endeavours to extend the circulation of the work "will not be displeasing to those Gentlemen who had the principal share in its composition." The little book* seems never to have been reprinted, and has become very scarce—so much so that it would probably have been forgotten altogether had the fact of its existence not been preserved in the amber of Coleridge's 'Biographia Literaria.' In that immortal miscellany (1817, i. 70; 1847, i. 64) Coleridge, in the course of a generous defence of Southey and Lamb, alludes to one of the many cases in which Southey's name had been connected with his own "for evil to which" his friend "is a stranger." The specimen cited is an attack made on them both (and on Lamb) in 'The Beauties of the Anti-Jacobin.' The editor of that work, says Coleridge,

"having previously informed the public that I had been dishonoured at Cambridge for preaching Deism, at a time when for my youthful ardor in defence of Christianity, I was decried as a bigot by the proselytes of French Phi- (or to speak more truly, Pse-) losophy... concludes with these words: 'Since this time he has left his native country, commenced citizen of the world, left his poor children fatherless, and his wife destitute. Ex his disce, his friends Lamb and Southey" (1817).

* "The Beauties of the Anti-Jacobin; or, Weekly Examiner; containing every Article of Permanent Utility in that Valuable and Highly Esteemed Paper... and a Prefatory Advertisement by the Editor. London: printed... for C. Chaplin, No. 66, Pall Mall. 1799." 12mo. pp. i-xii. 1-311. It is not mentioned by Lowndes, and there is no copy in the British Museum.

The passage in the 'Biog. Lit.' is so well known, or is at least so easily accessible, that more of it need not be quoted here, but it will be interesting to compare it with its own original draught in the Friend (No. 1, 1809); with the text of the anti-Jacobin note which provoked it; and also with the real facts travestied both by the anti-Jacobin and by Coleridge himself. It will save troublesome references if I quote the passage in the 'New Morality'—the swan-song of the Anti-Jacobin—which began it; premising that the "Clubs" were the "Whig Club," "Friends of Freedom," the "Corresponding Society," and probably some other so-called Jacobin societies whose spoutings answered according to their folly the roarings of the Government hacks of the day; and that the "holy hunchback" was a now shadowy personage named La Réveillère. Whether the fifth "wandering bard" was an individual whose name could not be recalled in the frenzy of composition, or was represented by the nobody in particular called "Co.," it is impossible, and fortunately unnecessary, to inquire. The foot-note is that which roused the plaintive ire of Coleridge, and was the contribution of the editor of the 'Beauties.' It is necessary to quote some of the context to show the full offensiveness of the stanza devoted to the poets:—

"Rejoice'd our CLUBS shall greet him, and install
The holy hunchback in thy dome, St. Paul,
While countless votaries thronging in his train
Wave their red caps, and hymn this jocund strain:
Carriers and Stars, sedition's evening host,
Thou Morning Chronicle, and Morning Post,
Whether ye make the Rights of Man your theme,
Your country libel, and your God blaspheme,
Or dirt on private worth and virtue throw,
Still, blasphemous or blackguard, praise Lepaux.

And ye five other wandering bards that move
In sweet accord of harmony and love,
C—dge, (1) and S—th—y, L—d, (2) and L—be and Co.
Tune all your mystic harps to praise Lepaux!

Praise him each Jacobin, or fool, or knave,
And your cropp'd heads in sign of worship wave!

All creeping creatures, venomous and low,
Paine, W—ll—me, G—dw—n, H—lc—ft, praise Lepaux!

"(1) Some of these youths were early corrupted in the metropolis, and initiated in the mysteries of Theophilanthropism, when scholars at that excellent seminary, Christ's Hospital. C—dge was nominated to an exhibition at Cambridge, and the Vice-master (soon after his admission) sent to him, on account of his non-attendance at chapel. This illuminated gentleman affected astonishment that any criminality could attach to him for his non-performance of religious worship, the trickery of Priestcraft, but if his presence was required, pro forma, as at a muster-roll, he had no great objection to attend. To the disgrace of discipline, and a Christian University, this avowed Deist was not expelled for such sin. His equalizing spirit and eccentricities had reduced this poetaster occasionally to such difficulties, that almost in want of bread he once addressed a soldier in the Park—'Are you one of the cut-throats of the despot?'—The man was at first astonished, but he soon found that his distress had determined him to enlist. His friends have frequently extricated him from this and other embarrassments. He has since married, had children and has now quitted the country, become a citizen of the world, left his little ones fatherless, and his wife destitute. 'Ex uno disce', his associates Southey and Lamb.—EDITOR of the 'Beauties of the Anti-Jacobin'."

(2) is a long note on Lloyd, not very interesting or pertinent.

It will be observed that although the note is even more foolish, inaccurate, and calumnious than the text of it, it does not go so far as to say that Coleridge "preached" Deism—only that he was an avowed Deist; and, so far from stating that he had been "dishonoured" at Cambridge for the avowal, says that it was the "Christian University" which disgraced itself by (supposititious) lenity towards its refractory student. Coleridge was, no doubt, quoting from memory, and, although in the remainder of his statement he gives the sense fairly enough, he ought not to have used quotation marks. The note in the 'Biographia Literaria' is not original to that work, but a short and mild and less characteristic modification of one in the first number of the Friend, which was not reproduced in what Coleridge called the "rifacimento" in three volumes (1818) known to this generation. It is far too long to be quoted here in full, but an extract and abstract may be given:—

"To cite one instance [of early calumnies which had injured his reputation and were still remembered against him] among many; while I was in Germany for the purpose of finishing my education, whither I was enabled to go by the munificence of my two honoured Patrons [J. and T. Wedgwood] whose names must not be profaned on such an occasion; and from which I returned before the proposed time, literally (I know not whether a Husband and Father ought to be ashamed of it) literally home-sick; one of the writers, concerned in the collection inserted a note in the 'Beauties of the Anti-Jacobin,' which after having informed the Public that I had been dishonoured at Cambridge for preaching Deism (about the time when I was deemed a perfect Bigot by the reigning Philosophers and their proselytes for my youthful ardor in defence of Christianity) concludes with these words: 'Since that time he (i.e., S. T. Coleridge) has left his native Country, commenced Citizen of the World, left his poor Children fatherless and his Wife destitute. Ex his disce his friends'—but I dare not desecrate their names. Suffice it to say, what may be said with severest truth, that it is absolutely impossible to select from the whole empire two men more exemplary in their domestic characters (both remarkably, and the one most awfully so) than the men whose names were here printed at full length. Can it be wondered at, that some good men were not especially friendly to a Party which encouraged and openly rewarded the Authors of such atrocious calumnies! (Qualis es nescio, sed per qualis agis, scio et doleo)."

Coleridge goes on to explain how slight and innocent have been his published works, and to make a long quotation, as certificate of his patriotic, anti-Jacobin sentiments, from his 'Fears in Solitude,' published before the attack. He swears that his works have been uniformly proper save for "one solitary sonnet which in what mood written and by what accident published personal delicacy forbids him to explain" (the Sonnet to Stanhope); in short, that with that exception none of his writings show "the least bias to Irreligion, Immorality, or Jacobinism." The whole passage is worthy of being reprinted from the scarce original, not for its historical value, but for the light it throws on the extraordinary illusions which Coleridge was capable of cherishing regarding the phases of political and religious opinion through which he had passed. His statement in the note with regard to his published works prior to 1799 (in the portion of the note not reproduced here) is ludicrously incorrect and incomplete—but that is a trifle; the important inaccuracy lies in his pretence that during his Cambridge career and for some years after he was looked upon as an ardent and even bigoted defender of orthodox Christianity. We know from his own account how when an undergraduate he made himself conspicuous by applauding Friend when that Don was on his trial for Unitarian doctrine, and that he was a Socinian till he was twenty-five, which was understating the case. In the re-cast 'Friend' (1818, ii. 241) he states that in 1794-5 he was a Necessitarian; but the most irrefragable evidence of his religious views about that time is to be found in a letter written by his friend Poole on September 22nd, 1794 ('Thomas Poole and his Friends,' i. 96). Poole was replying to an inquiry regarding Pantisocracy, and thus sketched the concoctors of that heated vapour, with candour, but with no unkindly intention—of Coleridge he reports that "in Religion he is a Unitarian, if not a Deist; in politics, a Democrat, to the utmost extent of that word"; and describes Southey as wavering between Deism and Atheism. And this is how the ardent defenders of Christianity appeared to another Poole who met them on the 18th of August, 1794:—

"Uterque verò rabie Democratica, quoad Politiam; et Infidelis quoad Religionem spectat, turpiter fervet. Ego maxime indignor."

As regards the abominable charge of "deserting" his wife and children when he went to Germany, there is ample disproof, and ample proof that the defence he makes was not ex-

* Thus translated by Mrs. Sandford ('T. Poole,' &c., i. 102): "Each of them was shamefully hot with Democratic rage as regards politics, and both Infidel as to religion. I was extremely indignant."

aggerated. It is, unfortunately, needful to say so much for Coleridge himself—but needless to say a word for the shining memories of Southey and Lamb. J. D. C.

UNPUBLISHED LETTERS OF SAMUEL PEPYS.

PEPYS'S letters are always interesting. The three which are given here are now published for the first time, and are not among the least interesting which he has left us. Two of these are addressed to Dr. Charlett, Master of University College, Oxford.* The first is probably a copy, and fills 34 pages of a folio sheet. The remainder of the fourth page contains the second letter, entirely in the handwriting of Pepys, and most likely also kept by him, as a copy of his communication to Dr. Charlett. The sheet is endorsed:—

"Augth {4} 1694. Mr Pepys to Dr Charlett, with particular relac'on to y^e intended gen^l Collection of MSS."

The letters run as follows, verbatim et literatim:—

York-Buildings. Augth 4, 1694.

To Dr Charlett.

S^r / Would you have my acknowledgments rise thicker, you must be contented to sow y^e Favours thinner. For 'tis to that alone you owe y^e having noe sooner had my Thanks, First, for y^e Poems brought me by Dr LLOYD, and my like return to y^e Gentleman your robb'd of them, to whom both in memory of his learned Father (my Honour'd Friend) & for his owne Virtues, I am, as I ought to be, a most humble Servant.

Your Specimen of Musick-Characters (w^{ch} I should also have long since thanked you for) is very agreeable, y^e Notes cleane, & what must appeare Gracefull, when the Word-Part shall be added in a Letter suitable. Whereof if you chance to make a Proof, before you enter (for good & all) upon y^e design'd Volume of CHURCH-MUSICK, pray pleasure me with y^e sight of it. And in y^e mean time, let this serve me to ground a Question upon: Whether Mr Vice-Chancell^r (whose Honourer I truly am) or you, have ever seen (for I never had, nor heard of, but for our poor Small-Coal-Man^t) I mean, the Mother-Canon establish'd by K. Edw^{6th} for answering y^e Rubrics in our Liturgy, where some parts of y^e Offices are left to y^e Priests Election, whether to be SAYD or SUNG? If not; there is a decent & not unharmonick plainness in it, that would not displease you. But I have never met with any of our Cathedral-men, even y^e oldest among them, Dr Child, Gibbons or other, that could tell me anything of it, though they owe their Daily Bread to it.

Mr Gibson^s speaks too well of my usage of him; he having a Right of his own to much better; besides y^e overmeasure y^e Name intitles him to, & not him only, but all that doe y^e honor of using it to me.

Among y^e many Mortificac'ons deriv'd on me from my Sin of JACOBINISME, it is no little one to have had y^e handling of so great a Curiosity as y^e TORQUIS, without capacity of bidding (as time was, I should have done) for y^e Propriety of it.

Capt. Hatton has honor'd me with his Visit, & y^e delivery of y^e last obliging Lett^r & y^e Print accompanying it. It joyes me to see anything of that Aspect going on. God increase them.

I learn from him how oppressively good you are to me, while to y^e Debt you have already drawne me into to y^e selfe, you go on to render it yet less superable, by running me upon a new Score in Mr Vice-Chancell^r's Books; the Captain telling me how much I am owing by y^e means for Civilities even there, where I durst not before have reckon'd myself soe much as knowne. Pray give y^e Vice-Chancell^r my most sensible Acknowledgments for them, & an Assurance of my being his most Obed^t Servant. But for any oth^r Stile of Paym^t you must answer for me to him y^e selfe; for you know, I can't.

Now for y^e Noble Worke you VIRTUOSI of Oxford are upon, of enriching our English World with y^e knowledg of a Wealth it is itself Mistress of, & does not yet know it, I mean its MANUSCRIPTS; I doe entirely subscribe to you, as to y^e Dignity & Importance of y^e UNDERTAKING,

* Arthur Charlett (1655-1722) D.D. 1692; ridiculed in Spectator, No. 43, April 19th, 1711, under the name of Abraham Froth, on the subject of 'Debating Clubs,' &c. (see 'Dict. Nat. Biog.,' vol. x.).

† Thomas Britton, b. 1651, d. 1714.

‡ He alludes here most probably to 'The Book of Common Prayer Noted,' 1550, by John Marbeck, organist of Windsor. This was printed by Grafton, and contained the rudiments of our cathedral service (Hawkins).

§ A clerk in the Navy Office, author of memoirs of the expeditions of the navy from 1685 to 1695, &c.

making it my Every Day's Duty to propagate y^e Opinion of it, & am most ready to contribute what-ev^r (if any thing) I have, worthy of a place in it. I say, IF ANYTHING; because from y^e excess of Expectations you seem to have from me, I hold it but necessary to set you right in them, by observing to you; That being (God knows) not only no^t p^render to, much less Professor of, any of y^e learned Faculties, but on y^e contrary, a Person known to have pass'd y^e greater & more docible part of my Life, in one uninterrupted Course, or rather Tumult of Business, I have had very little Self-Leisure to read, & as few Temptations therefore as Opportunities of looking out for Curiosities on any other Head than that whereto I have thus singly been given-up, I mean y^e SEA; i.e., for so much of it as may be thought to have been of use to me in y^e Service of my ROYALL MASTERS & COUNTRY, Namely y^e HISTORY, LAWS & ECONOMY of its NAVY. And a just Reproach I should think it of to me, to have one Hole found unsearcht by me, or knowingly to have failed of rendering my selfe Master of any one written Sheete that either Paines or Price could help me to, on that Subject. But how far a Masse of Papers, for y^e most part unconnected, & those out of any of y^e trodden Roads of com'on Reading, can be thought convertible to publick use, I must acknowledge I cannot see, nor consequently (as numerous as their Volumes are) how any thing can be added by them to y^e WEIGHT, whatever they may do to y^e NUMBER of yo^r COLLECTION.

Nevertheless, that you may not suspect y^e simplicity of my meaning herein; I shall within a little time find leisure to digest & communicate to you, a just Catalogue of what I have; in confidence of yo^r not exposing it elsewhere, till by yo^r Return of it with yo^r Remarks what thereof (if ought) you judge proper for yo^r Press, you give me opportunity of reviewing it.

But for Com'on-Good, I must in y^e meantime lodge with you, what I too frequently find thrown in my way, and (if not removed) may I doubt in many places prevail to the injury of yo^r UNDERTAKING. Namely, the Burthen that 'tis apprehended will arise from it, to those Gentlemen alone & Societys, whose more forward Affections for Learning shall prompt them to y^e exposing of their Catalogues, through y^e unreasonable importunities (& interruptions too, where a Man is his own Library-Keeper) it must subject them to, from Persons who by concealing their own, shall stop all Expectac'ons of amends for y^e trouble they give us for OURS, by any reciprocal Use of THEIRS.

This I find sticking with many Gentlemen, who I am sure are noe worse affected to y^e Design than ourselves. Wherefore, you who have employ'd most thoughts upon this Matter, & can best instruct me to remove it, pray doe. For till you furnish me with a better; y^e best Expedient I can think of is, the havinge some more Solemn Notificac'on made of what's a doing, than y^e World seems to have yet had of it. And that done; I shall (as to my particular) thinke myselfe absolved from any Obligac'on of communicating ought of y^e little I am likely to be found Master of, upon any other Condit'ion, than that of y^e Demandants accommodating me with what I shall ask as an equivalent, either out of his own, or (by his procurement) out of any oth^r of y^e Catalogues contained in yo^r Collection.

I most respectfully kiss yo^r Hands & am,

Honrd Sir,

Yo^r most faithful and obedient Servant

S. PEPPS.

I minde yo^r Question touching my Friend Mr Evelyn's Stock & Sr Rich^d Browne's.

August 9th 1694.

Sr/ The Penny-Post brought mee yesterday a Blank^t that held more in it, than 4 sides-full of mine that went hence towards you 2 Great Posts agoe; it shewing mee that all is already done, that (for want of knowing it) I therein proposed as wanting. Sr I know I owe this particular Satisfaction (as I doe a great many more) to you, & will loose no time in providing for your Inspection a List of what written matters I have (as I promised You in my last) & wait your remitting it mee with one Expuratory Dash through it; for I ought to expect no better. I am

Dear Sr

Yo^r most obedient Serv^t

S. PEPPS.

The explanation, I suppose, of the fourth paragraph of the first of these letters is that Pepps, having lost his appointment at the Revolution, owing to his suspected devotion to King James, could no longer afford to bid for or buy expensive curiosities. Whether the "Turquis" mentioned by him was an ancient British ornament or a turquoise* would be now difficult to decide; but it does not matter. The thing was an object of which, in better days, he would have liked to dispute the "Propriety" with his correspondent. The scheme of making a catalogue of the MS. wealth of England was not, I presume, carried out as proposed by Dr. Charlett, for I can find no trace of its execution. The authorities of the Bodleian Library may be probably much better informed on this point.

The third letter is entirely in the handwriting of Pepps, and is thus endorsed: "July 5th, 1693. Mr Pepps to Mr Southwell newly a Clerke of y^e Council; part Complent, part businessse." The letter is as follows:—

York-Buildings. July 5. 1693.

Sr,—I follow you as soon as I can with my PECCAVI for yesterday's Fault; not doubting my living long enough to give your Greatness opportunities enough of Revenge, by turning mee off as slightly. But remember you would have it soe.

With this, I send you 2 Papers; one by Com^{is}sion from Mr Evelin to bee delivered to the old Gentleman,† whom I would have you stripp, even while alive, of every State-Virtue hee has; it being but equal, that while hee presses you thus into Business, hee grudge you none of his Furniture for it. Not that I think you want an ample Stock of your owne. But Time has some Lessons which it keeps for its owne Teaching only, unless you can & will borrow them of a Friend that has paid for them. I say Will. For 'twas not Solomon's Fault, that I learnt too late; nor shall bee mine if you doe soe too. To shun being too righteous, as much as being too wise. There's one of them.

The other Paper is to yourselfe, & brings a piece of Work with it. It is an Extract of a Letter of a Predecessor of yours one William Cecil, that contains a Naval Note I would bee glad to improve; by knowing what (if any thing) is to be found in the Council-Books of that time relative to the matter therein mention'd, & which bespeaks its being soon follow'd by something from the Council-Board. Whether these Books bee within your Reach, or to bee come at at all, I know not. But if they bee, pray grant mee this as the first Cast of your Office; wherein I doe with all my heart pray God to bless you, & rest

Your most affect^d & hereditary humble Servant.

S. PEPPS.

In his advice to young Southwell "to shun being too righteous, as much as being too wise," Pepps probably hints to his correspondent that he must look after his own interests, and, without "being too wise" (=too greedy?), secure for himself remuneration from other sources (as Pepps himself must have done, by receiving douceurs), when he failed to receive it from the State. It is well known that at Pepps's death there was a balance of 28,007l. 2s. 1½d. due to him from the Crown; and the original vouchers still remain an heirloom in the family (H. B. Wheatley's 'Samuel Pepps and the World he Lived In'). Such advice from Pepps was thoroughly characteristic.

JULIAN MARSHALL.

THE INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF ORIENTALISTS.

Woking, May 24, 1890.

In reply to Prof. F. Max Müller's letter in to-day's Athenæum, I beg leave to say that it is a series of misstatements.

1. What he calls "a private and perfectly legitimate circular" was not merely an "innocent inquiry" from the members of the last Congress as to the place of the next meeting, but a public protest from Orientalists generally, dated Paris, October 10th, 1889, "against the composition" of the Committee of three ex-presidents nominated at Christiania and against the proceedings of the last Congress (in September, 1889). The circular also acknowledged the right of the Paris founders to select the place of the next meeting, as this had not been done at Christiania; it suggested Paris or London as

* "My Turkies, I had it of Leah, when I was a Batcheler."

† Merob. of Ven., III. i., 1623.

† I suppose this to be an allusion to Mr. Southwell's father, also a correspondent of Pepps.

places where we should not be centres of public attention or amusement, as had been the case elsewhere; and it ended with an invitation to London. No other circular exists, except an "Appeal to the Founders" to reassert the statutes which had been broken at Christiania.

2. It can, therefore, not be the case that "many," if "any," of the signatories of that circular "supposed that any formal invitation from Paris, London, or Oxford, or any other place, would be forwarded to the ex-presidents and be submitted by them to the International Committee," considering that they protested against the constitution of the Christiania Committee, and that no such International Committee existed in September or October last, if it exists now.

3. Prof. Chwolson signed immediately under the names of the first three leaders of the protest, and also wrote: "It is clear that the last Congress has only slightly accomplished its proper aim, that the division of members into three classes was very offensive. The foundation of an institute was rejected by the assembly and will hardly be carried out." As for his advice to write to the Christiania Committee, this was apparently to prevent a split among Orientalists as to the place of the meeting. Prof. Chwolson adding that "Landberg will probably be the only one who might not agree to that selection" (London). Prof. Chwolson's letter was in no sense a private one, and, if it had been, his own public use of it would destroy any private character that it may have possessed.

4. An opportunity was given by the circular to Orientalists who merely wished to vote for the place of the next meeting to record their names under a separate heading. The manner in which Prof. Chwolson signed precludes the view that he merely voted for the place. Only seven members did so, and they are not considered as signatories of the circular. Prof. Chwolson's name has now been entered as merely voting for London, in deference to the wish now expressed "on his word of honour." He ought, however, to have written direct to one of the secretaries to explain the extent of his concurrence in the circular, and not to M. Landberg or to his fidus Achates.

5. It is not the case that Prof. Chwolson's "name has been so often quoted as an active supporter of the malcontent party," if by that improper appellation are meant the supporters of our original statutes. His name had been quoted in the National Zeitung, along with those of Gubernatis, Cust, and Schefer, as likely to be "co-opted" by the four members of the Christiania Committee who had received the "right" (?) of "co-opting" each one additional member (along interval indeed from our international assembly of signatories, representing twenty-two countries by 300 Orientalists, as a nucleus for a Congress of probably three times that number of members).

6. As for "the invitation from Oxford not" being "yet officially accepted" by the Christiania Committee, this body cannot "officially" accept an invitation on behalf of the International Congress of Orientalists, because a Committee that has been nominated by a breach of the statutes that have been our law since 1873 cannot claim to exercise any of the rights of a Committee under these statutes. Besides, no invitation was ever knowingly issued to that Committee, or to its equally illegal offspring, the so-called International Committee, by the great majority of those who signed the Oxford circular, dated March last, which was headed by Prof. Max Müller. That circular, as sent round at Oxford, does not bear the name of the Christiania Committee, or of M. Landberg as the addressee of the invitation; but the circular as sent to M. Landberg does bear his name in print, and was used in the Swedish papers as a proof of the confidence of the Oxford authorities in that person, and of their hostility to our Congress that had already been fixed, in January last, for

* A document, "paper," or "form," with spaces left blank to be filled up at the pleasure of the person to whom it is given ('N.E.D.').

London in 1891. Which circular, if either, is "private and perfectly legitimate" or "innocent"? Nothing could have been further from the thoughts of most of the signatories of the Oxford circular than such a demonstration. They merely wished to extend the traditional hospitality of Oxford to the established International Congress of Orientalists, and not to a fraction thereof, or to a new Oriental Congress. They were given to "understand that the place of assembly of the next Oriental Congress had not yet been fixed," and that their signature "would imply general support, nothing else." As for "any one not being competent to elect a president" till the Christiania Committee accepts an invitation that was not properly made, all I can say is that the only lawful authority that can now exist—the founders and the international assembly of Orientalists—has already elected the hon. president, president, vice-president, committee, and office-bearers for the ninth International Congress of Orientalists, to be held in London in September, 1891, on the basis of the existing statutes. Besides, "some one has" already "been competent to elect" Prof. M. Müller as the president of an Oriental Congress to be held at Oxford in 1892, for which it is said that M. Landberg will bear all the expenses and has himself issued an invitation. This would be a compliment indeed to the hospitality and to the initiative of Oxford!

7. It was not an accident, as Prof. Max Müller kindly suggests, that our circular, "the innocent inquiry," was not addressed to him; but if he, too, protests against the proceedings at the last Congress, in which he took such a prominent part—if he, too, objects to the composition of the Christiania Committee, and if he, too, accepts the invitation to London, it will, I am sure, be gladly sent to him for signature by any of the secretaries.

8. I notice that Prof. Max Müller has changed the title of our Congresses from that of "Orientalists" to that of "Oriental scholars." He clearly shows by this designation that his Congress does not belong to the existing series, and I can only hope that its Oriental scholarship will surpass that of the Stockholm menu. I have only once before seen the new designation, and it heads a libellous article in a newspaper, which I trust will not be traced to the professor.

9. Our majority is that of Orientalists in most countries, not of the 713 members of the last Congress, including tourists, &c., who will not be attracted to a sober Congress either in London or at Oxford.

G. W. LEITNER.

Literary Crossp.

WE have to announce that Messrs. Longman & Co. have made arrangements for the purchase of Messrs. Rivington's business. Mr. Francis Rivington, who is the sole proprietor, retires from business on July 1st, and the entire interests of the oldest firm in the trade will thus be transferred to Messrs. Longman & Co., who will from July 1st supply all books now published by Messrs. Rivington. The business dates from 1711, when Charles Rivington put up the sign of the Bible and Crown, some twelve years or so before Thomas Longman commenced publishing at the Ship and Black Swan.

THE avowed opponents of international copyright in Congress are Mr. Hopkins, Mr. Mills, Mr. Peters, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Payson, and Mr. Lind. Their reasons why they vote against it are: 1, because it was unknown when the constitution was adopted; 2, because an alien author has "a mine of compensation" in having his works reprinted and read by those who pay him nothing; 3, because charity begins at home, and the alien author is not deserving of any; 4, because the alien author can obtain copyright in America by becoming naturalized; 5, because natural justice favours home copyright and public policy condemns international copyright; and, 6, because if international copyright were granted the free schools in America might be closed, cheap books be unobtainable there, and men like Mr. Lind might be excluded from Congress. Mr. Butterworth compressed the case for the other side into two sentences:—"It is truthfully urged that our people are the greatest readers on earth. I regret if it shall occur that, with all their reading, they have failed to learn that there is a moral obligation resting upon us to pay for the books we buy." He also asked the following pertinent question:—"Piracy upon the high sea has long been condemned by the nation. Shall the American Republic be the last to condemn piracy upon the land?"

MR. H. M. STANLEY spent his last evening before leaving London for the relief of Emin Pasha with Sir John Pender, and on parting the latter gave Mr. Stanley a miniature edition of Burns's poems published by Messrs. Bryce, of Glasgow. This the great explorer said he would carry wherever he went. Sir John Pender, in recently writing to Mr. Bryce, says:—

"When I met Stanley in Egypt in the spring I had not been in conversation with him many minutes before he reminded me of the little copy of Burns's poems, and he said it had been a great source of comfort to him; he had read it many times over, and he believed there was no better-thumbed book in existence than that little volume. He said that Burns was such a child of nature, and that he was so much in sympathy with him, that many times he was not only deeply touched but greatly encouraged by the perusal of the poems."

A NEW story by Mr. Bret Harte, entitled 'Through the Santa Clara Wheat,' will be commenced in Mr. Archibald Grove's periodical Short Cuts for June 14th.

PROF. EDWARD ARBER has just issued 'A List of 837 London Publishers, 1553-1640 A.D.,' which includes the name of every one who entered a book at Stationers' Hall during that period, together with the names of about eighty other persons who avowedly published, in those years, one or more works in the metropolis without registering the same at the Hall.

MR. J. H. SLATER, the editor of Book Prices Current, has in the press a new edition, rewritten, of his 'Library Manual'; also a treatise on 'Book Collecting,' which will form part of the "Young Collector Series," and a work on engravings, compiled with special reference to their market value. The same author will also publish in the autumn 'The Romance of Fleet Street,' in which the literary history of that thoroughfare is traced in popular form from the earliest times until the conclusion of the reign of George III.

DR. EMIL REICH's lectures at Oxford last term 'On Græco-Roman Institutions from Anti-Evolutionist Points of View' are to be published by Messrs. Parker & Co. Mr. Elkin Mathews is going to issue an English edition of Dr. Schaff's work on Dante.

THE first number of a new magazine, entitled Berkshire Notes and Queries, is announced for publication early in June by Mr. Elliot Stock.

THE studentships offered by the Dowager Lady Stanley of Alderley, the Marquis of Ripon, and the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs to enable selected students, attending lectures in connexion with the London University Extension Society, to attend the summer meetings at Oxford or Cambridge have been awarded, two to women, and one to a male student.

AN effort is being made to extend the claims of a library which has been formed in Manchester for the use of girls who work in mills, and the public is appealed to for books or money to purchase them, the object being to provide literature of a healthy character for the readers. Miss Harrison, 138, Upper Brook Street, Manchester, is the librarian.

THE library of the late Dr. Ainsworth, of Manchester, was dispersed under the hammer last week. An incomplete copy of the Chetham Society's volumes realized 13*l.*, and Dugdale's 'Monasticon Anglicanum,' 20*l.*

MR. STOTT's new series of translations is to be styled "Masterpieces of Foreign Authors," not "Foreign Favourite Series," that name being claimed as their property by another firm.

THE remains of Mickiewicz, the celebrated Polish poet, are to be taken from Montmorency, where they at present lie, and buried at Cracow at the expense of the Galician Diet.

THE new reading of the seventeenth book of Strabo (not the tenth, as at first announced) in the palimpsest codex found by Father Cozza-Luzzi, relative to the island of Gaudos, is in chapter iii., and is as follows: Τὼν δὲ μέγιστα ὀνομαζομένων κατὰ τὸν παράπλουν τόπων τὸ τε ναύσταθμὸν ἔστι καὶ τὸ Ζεφύριον, πρόσθιον ἔχον, καὶ ἄλλο Ζεφύριον, καὶ ἄκρα Χερρόνηρος λιμένα ἔχουσα· κείται δὲ κατὰ *Κύκλον τῆς Κρήτης ἐν διάρματι χιλίων καὶ πεντακοσίων σταδίων νότῳ· κ.τ.λ. It not being probable that the word κύκλον was a proper name of any place in Crete, the expression κατὰ κύκλον would have no meaning. Therefore some one thought to correct the KATA-KYKAON of the MSS. into KATAMYKAON, that is, κατ' Ἀμυκλον, thus referring the expression to the passage of Stephanus of Byzantium and of others declaring that in ancient times the Amycleans came to Crete from Laconia and colonized Gortyna, and that in Crete there existed a city bearing the name of Amyclæon. Indeed, Prof. Halbherr has found in Crete an inscription hitherto unedited, but which he will shortly publish, making mention of the Cretan Amycleans—this being the first time the name occurs in epigraphy. Father Cozza has now found that the true reading of the passage in the Vatican palimpsests is KATA-KAYΔON, namely, κατὰ Καῦδον, the name of the island situated between the Libyan coast and the south-west shore of Crete, and mentioned in Acts xxvii. 16.

THE spring meeting of the American Oriental Society was held at Boston, U.S., on May 7th. Prof. W. D. Whitney sent in his resignation of the presidency, and Dr. W. H. Ward was chosen to succeed him. Prof. Ceriani, Brugsch Pasha, Prof. Schrader, and Prof. Whitney were elected honorary members.

THE chief Parliamentary Papers of the week are Correspondence relating to the Federation Conference in Australia (1s. 2d.); Third Report of the Royal Commission on Horse-breeding, with Evidence (1s. 2d.); Fifth Report from the Select Committee of the House of Lords on the Sweating System (1s. 3d.); Home Accounts of the Government of India (6d.); Eighth Report of the Royal University of Ireland, for 1889 (2d.); and Forty-second Report of the Ecclesiastical Commission. Of the Trade Reports published this week that on the manufacture of perfumes at Nice (3d.) is the most interesting.

SCIENCE

ORNITHOLOGICAL LITERATURE.

The Fauna of British India, including Ceylon and Burma.—Birds. Vol. I. By Eugene W. Oates. (Taylor & Francis.)—This is the third of the series edited by Mr. W. T. Blanford under the authority of the Secretary of State for India in Council, its predecessors being his own first instalment of the mammalia and two volumes on fishes by the late Dr. Day. That the services of Mr. Oates have been secured is a matter for general congratulation among ornithologists, especially those who are devoted to the study of Oriental avifaunas, the style in which Mr. Oates produced the 'Birds of Burma' a few years since having indicated his fitness for the present task. We are told by the editor in his preface (which is, by the way, an admirable summary of the literature of Indian ornithology during the last forty years) that two more volumes will be required to complete the birds, owing to the great increase in the number of species known to inhabit British India since the publication of Jerdon's classic work. It is true that this excess is largely owing to a great extension of the area now comprised in our empire, but it is also due in no small degree to the labours of the colleagues and successors of the pioneers Sykes, Hodgson, Jerdon, and Blyth. Our Natural History Museum has recently been enriched by the presentation of the Hume Collection, amounting to 60,000 skins, besides nests and eggs; it also possesses the collections of the late Marquis of Tweeddale, Mr. Hodgson, Gould, and others; so that the author of the present work has enjoyed unrivalled opportunities for study, of which he has made excellent use. His scheme of classification, though somewhat novel, has evidently received great attention; and the only point to which we take exception is a tendency in Mr. Oates to multiply genera. The salient features in many of these are illustrated by characteristic woodcuts, chiefly of heads, with a few of feathers and feet, as well as several whole-lengths, all of which will be of considerable use to the student. The latter will, however, miss the interesting notes on habits, migration, folk-lore, &c., which made Jerdon's work so attractive; but, owing to the limits assigned by the authorities to the number as well as the size of the volumes forming this series, the editor and his staff have been compelled to compress, and even to omit much valuable matter. The present volume—remarkable for its conciseness—contains a large portion of the order Passeres, and a second is expected to appear within the twelvemonth.

Sundevall's Tentamen. Translated into English, with Notes, by Francis Nicholson. (Porter.)—Sundevall's 'Methodi Naturalis Avium Dispendarum Tentamen,' to give its full title, was published at Stockholm in 1872-3, the preface and introduction being in Swedish and French, while the rest of the work is in Latin of an extremely terse character. Mr. Nicholson has considered that an English translation of this work on the classification of birds would supply a want, and, with the assistance of Mr. R. B. Sharpe and Mr. H. T. Wharton, he appears to have performed his task in a most satisfactory manner. On comparing this version with our freely annotated copy of the original, we are glad to see that many misprints and other errors have been corrected, while some valuable notes have been added, which will aid the student in referring to the views held by other ornithologists on this much controverted subject. The word Férocé in the French preface (its equivalent is not given in the Swedish) is translated by Mr. Nicholson as 'Faroes'; but Ferro or Hierro, one of the Canary Islands—an important meridian with old geographers—is obviously intended with reference to longitude. A short obituary notice and a frontispiece of Sundevall are given.

Birds' Nests, Eggs, and Egg-Collecting, by R. Kearton (Cassell & Co.), is a little work illustrated with sixteen coloured plates, the latter of a cheap and ordinary description, and frequently inadequate for the identification of the species. The descriptions of the nesting-habits of the familiar birds are better than the plates; but even so they leave much to be desired, and as soon as the author goes beyond his personal experience, which is limited, he frequently falls into error. The arrangement is dependent upon the figures which can be crowded into each plate, but a highly necessary index is a redeeming feature.

GEOGRAPHICAL NOTES.

CAPT. DELPORT and Lieut. Gillis will start on June 6th for the Congo, for the purpose of making a magnetical survey and of determining latitudes and longitudes by a series of careful observations. They propose to ascend the Congo as far as Nyangwe, and to return by way of the Sankuru and Kasai. The Belgian Chambers have voted 1,200*l.* towards the expenses of this scientific expedition.

The Zeitschrift of the Berlin Geographical Society publishes its most welcome geographical bibliography for the year 1889, which fills no fewer than 218 closely-printed pages. Dr. A. Wolfstieg, who has succeeded the late Dr. Koser in the preparation of this useful work of reference, has performed his task well. The classification, accepted after consultation with Baron Richthofen, is upon the whole satisfactory, and the only thing still needed is an alphabetical index of authors. In the same Zeitschrift will be found the first of a series of articles on the 'Pre-Columbian History of America,' by Prof. E. Gelcich, and the translation of Col. Muhammed Bey Sadik's account of a pilgrimage to Mekka, with a capital map by Dr. R. Kiepert.

Petermann's Mittheilungen publishes an excellent map, by G. E. Fritzsche, of the caravan routes connecting Zeila with Ankobar, as also a paper on a proposed harbour on the west coast of Sleswick, which is to be constructed between Röm Island and the mainland, and which would be accessible at all states of the tide, and throughout the year, to vessels drawing eighteen feet.

Dr. Emin Pasha has forwarded three volumes of meteorological observations to Gotha, which extend from August, 1881, to February 27th, 1890, and are now being prepared for publication. The rainfall at Wadelai is stated to amount to forty-two inches.

The Scottish Geographical Magazine publishes an interesting paper on recent explorations in the regions of the Upper Madre de Dios and Purus, by Col. A. R. P. Labré and Father Nicolas Armentia. The information has been furnished to the Society by M. H. Guillaume, the Peruvian Consul-General at Southampton, and is supplemented by a rough but useful map.

A 'Map of the Western Part of Asia Minor,' by Dr. H. Kiepert, on a scale of 1:250,000, is nearly ready for publication. This map is based upon the compiler's own researches and upon many unpublished materials. A map of the whole of Asia Minor, on half the scale, is also far advanced, and Dr. Kiepert hopes to be able to publish it in the course of next year.

We learn from a report on the labours and publications of Austrian Government institutions and scientific societies, which appears in a recent number of the Mittheilungen of the Vienna Geographical Society, that the 'Topographical Map of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy,' on a scale of 1:75,000, has been completed. This map consists of 752 sheets; it was begun in 1872, and its rapid completion is due to the employment of the heliogravure process in its production.

G. Cora's Cosmos publishes a 'Bathymetrical Map of the Ligurian Sea,' based upon surveys made by Capt. G. B. Magnaghi of the Italian navy.

Henry M. Stanley: his Life, Travels, and Explorations, by the Rev. H. W. Little (Chapman & Hall), is the most recent addition to the many popular volumes which deal with the exploits of the most successful of African explorers. It is written in a lively style, and exhibits a good deal of literary ability, but possesses at most only a transient value. Of Stanley's 'life,' apart from his achievements as a special correspondent and explorer, we learn but little, and that little is not always to be trusted. His travels, however, are dealt with very fully and ably, and the narrative is rendered interesting by copious extracts from Mr. Stanley's published works. Mr. Little's own remarks in illustration of Mr. Stanley's achievements are not always particularly happy, and show him to have but a superficial knowledge of African geography. The author is quite mistaken when he states that Bruce and Beke were the 'only travellers who had made anything like a detailed examination of the region' to be traversed by the Abyssinian expedition of 1868. A very curious story is told of a brother of Tipu Tibb, absurdly described as 'the invincible monarch of the empire of Karonge,' who is said to have been captured in a slave-dhow, and to have been condemned to be hung at the yardarm, when he saved his neck by betraying his father and brothers to his captors. This is a very unlikely story, to say the least of it. The book is not furnished with a map, nor is there an index.

M. Venukoff writes to the Paris Geographical Society that the English have crossed the Himalayas and the Karakorum Pass, and established a garrison at Shahidula, south-south-east of Yarkand, and that the Chinese are so alarmed thereat that they have commenced building a fort for themselves close by. Shahidula is a post 11,780 feet above sea level, and just north of the Suget Pass between Kashmir and Yarkand. It lies on the Chinese side of the Himalayan watershed, and marks the furthest point to which the Kashgar jurisdiction extended at the time of Sir Douglas Forsyth's mission in 1873. M. Venukoff mentions that two British posts have also been established at Mastuj and Gao Kuch, between Gilgit and the Hindu Kush Mountains.

Another piece of intelligence from Central Asia is that a formidable landslip took place in the valley of the Upper Zarafshan river about February 1st. A huge rocky mass, mostly conglomerate, has fallen and blocked the river about 45 kilometres above Panjkent, and the accumulation of water has resulted in the formation of a lake 12 kilometres in length.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—May 22.—The President in the chair.—The following papers were read: 'A Contribution to the Etiology of Diphtheria,' by Dr. Klein, 'The Chemical Products of the Growth of Bacillus anthracis and their Physiological Action,' by Dr.

S. Martin,—"On the Development of the Atrial Chamber of Amphioxus," by Mr. A. Willey,—"On a Method of determining the Value of Rapid Variations of a Difference of Potential by means of the Capillary Electrometer," by Mr. G. J. Burch,—"and 'A Bacteria-killing Globulin,' by Mr. E. H. Hankin.

ASIATIC.—May 21.—Anniversary Meeting.—Sir T. Wade, President, in the chair.—The election of Mr. M. L. van Deventer as a Non-Resident Member was announced.—The President reviewed the position of the Society, both as to its finances and as to its work. Though a small body, it was larger in numbers than it had ever been, and was steadily though slowly increasing, and its financial position was thoroughly sound. After giving details on these points, the President pointed out that the activity of the Society in its special work was encouraging. The Journal was not only much larger than formerly, but had now for some time been issued at regular quarterly intervals; and the Society was also undertaking the delivery of a regular course of lectures, and was contemplating the foundation of a new fund for the translation of Oriental works on history and geography.—The following were elected as the Council and officers of 1890-91: President, Right Hon. the Earl of Northbrook; Director, Major-General Sir H. C. Rawlinson; Vice-Presidents, Major-General Sir A. Cunningham, Major-General Sir F. J. Goldsmid, Prof. Sir M. Monier-Williams, Rev. Prof. A. H. Sayce, and Prof. W. R. Smith; Council, F. F. Arbuthnot, Sir G. Birdwood, E. G. Browne, F. V. Dickinson, Right Hon. Sir M. E. Grant Duff, Prof. Douglas, T. Duka, J. F. Hewitt, Sir W. W. Hunter, H. C. Kay, Major-General Sir Peter S. Lumsden, General R. MacLagan, E. Delmar Morgan, Robert Sewell, and T. H. Thornthorn; Treasurer, E. L. Brandreth; Secretary, Prof. T. W. Rhys Davids; Hon. Secretary, R. N. Cust.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—May 22.—Dr. J. Evans, President, in the chair.—Mr. Micklethwaite called attention to the fact that in the process of "restoration" of the wheel window in the north transept of Westminster Abbey, tracery of an entirely new pattern had been substituted for what was there, and the interesting eighteenth century glass, though it had been in a manner replaced, had been made to fit the new tracery by the summary process of cutting off the lower parts of the figures of apostles and evangelists forming the chief feature of the design.—It was thereupon proposed by Dr. Freshfield, seconded by Mr. Franks, and carried with only one dissentient, "That this Society bears with deep regret that the eighteenth century glass that was formerly in the north transept window of Westminster Abbey Church has been irretrievably injured by cutting it down to fit a new window of an entirely different design, and at the same time expresses a hope that the old glass now in the east and west windows will be preserved uninjured."—A copy of the resolution was ordered to be sent to the Dean and Chapter of Westminster.—Mr. Peacock exhibited an enamelled button with figure of a horseman of sixteenth century date, recently found near Brigg.—Dr. Lawford exhibited a gold locket, with beautiful filigree work with jewellery enamel, of sixteenth century date, enclosing portraits of Charles I. and Henrietta Maria.—Mr. Atkinson exhibited a ring dial and silver-mounted penner, probably of last century date.—Mr. Woodruff exhibited a number of specimens of ancient carved woodwork, chiefly from Somerset churches, which had been cast out by "restoring" architects.—Chancellor Ferguson, by the kindness of Mr. M. MacInnes, exhibited a fine processional cross of crystal with gilding and figure of silver-gilt. From a scroll inside part of the stem it appears that the cross was made in 1550 and repaired in 1739.—Mr. Hardy read a paper showing from wills and churchwardens' accounts the supposed modern, but actually very early origin of seat appropriation in churches.

BRITISH ARCHÆOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION.—May 21.—Mr. J. W. Grover in the chair.—A series of flint implements found during the progress of sewerage works at Forest Gate and Wanstead, Essex, were exhibited by the Chairman, among the objects being a singular flint knife, very smooth and thin. Two bronze celts were also exhibited, which were recently found near Mitcham Junction, 6 feet deep in drift gravel.—Mr. MacMichael described several articles of Roman fettle ware which have been found in some excavation works in Bow Lane, among them being an almost perfect mortarium, and a fragment of a very large vase of Upchurch ware.—A paper was read by Mr. W. J. Davis on an altar slab which exists at Sheepscote, Gloucestershire. After referring to many curious evidences afforded by ancient place-names in the locality, he indicated their bearing upon the recorded history. Many of the old names are similar to those found in Scandinavia, and there are many indications of the presence of the Danes, Deadcombe being the site of a battle in which the invaders were routed. The Earls of Shrewsbury had an extensive mansion in the parish, and the altar slab which formed the subject of the paper belonged to the private chapel of the mansion. This has long since been demolished, the ruins being used as a quarry. The slab is now built up over the door of a pig-stye. It bears an inscription recording that it was consecrated by Nicholas, who was Suffragan Bishop of Worcester, 1392-1421, and dedicated to the Holy Trinity and All Saints.—In the discussion which ensued Mr. E. Walford referred to the very few examples which remain of inscribed altar slabs.—The second paper was by Mr. E. P. Loftus Brock, who described some curious features of Saxon architecture at Stevington Church, Beds. The western tower has been found to be of Saxon work. This was revealed during the restoration of the church in 1872. Still more recently the Rev. J. R. H. Duke, vicar, observing some indications of openings in the north and south walls (now within the later aisles), had the plaster removed, with the result that a south doorway has been found, and two windows splayed on both sides alike. In one of these a thin oak slab, in which an opening has been cut, still remains, but very greatly decayed.

ZOOLOGICAL.—May 20.—Prof. W. H. Flower, President, in the chair.—Mr. G. Bolton exhibited photographs, principally of animals in the gardens and in Mr. W. Rothschild's menagerie.—Prof. Flower exhibited a photograph of a nest of a horn-bill (Trogon melanoleucus), taken from a specimen in the Albany Museum, Grahamstown, in which the female was shown "walled in."—Mr. Selater pointed out the characters of a new toucan of the genus Pteroglossus from the Upper Amazons, proposed to be called P. didymus.—Communications were read: from Sir E. Newton, on the reported discovery of dodo's bones in Mauritius in 1885, by the late Mr. Caldwell; it appeared that the bones discovered were not those of the dodo, by Mr. R. Lydekker, on some bird-remains from the cavern-deposits of Malta; these remains indicated a vulture larger than any existing species, which, from the characters of the cervical vertebra, he referred to the genus Gyps, under the name of G. melitensis; they also comprised some bones of a crane, of the size of Grus antigone, for which the name Grus melitensis was proposed,—and by Dr. Hans Gadow, on some cases of the modification of certain organs in mammals and birds which seemed to be illustrations of the inheritance of acquired characters.

METEOROLOGICAL.—May 21.—Mr. B. Latham, President, in the chair.—Mr. W. Friese-Greene and Mr. F. H. Phillips were elected Fellows.—The following papers were read: "Rainfall of the Globe," by Mr. W. B. Tripp. This was a comparative chronological account of some of the principal rainfall records. The earliest record is that of Paris, which commenced in 1689. The English records began in 1726. The rainfall observations in the southern hemisphere do not extend over a very long period; at Adelaide they were commenced in 1839, but they do not go back further than 1866 for New Zealand.—"Mutual Influence of two Pressure Plates upon Each Other, and Comparison of the Pressures upon Small and Large Plates," and "On the Variations of Pressure caused by the Wind blowing across the Mouth of a Tube," by Mr. W. H. Dines.

PHYSICAL.—May 16.—Prof. W. E. Ayrton, President, in the chair.—Prof. W. Coleman was elected a Member.—Lord Rayleigh exhibited and described an arrangement of "Huyghens's Gearing in Illustration of Electric Induction."—Dr. S. P. Thompson made a communication on "Dr. Koenig's Researches on the Physical Basis of Music," in the course of which Dr. Koenig performed numerous novel and interesting experiments, clearly illustrating the subject to a crowded audience.

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.

- Mon. Surveyors' Institution, 3.—Annual Meeting.
 Royal Institution, 5.—General Monthly.
 Engineers, 21.—Pick's System of manufacturing Salt in Vacuum.
 Mr. F. F. W. Nurey.
 Victoria Institute, 8.
 Aristotelian, 8.—Is the Distinction of Feeling, Cognition, and Conation valid as an Ultimate Distinction of the Mental Functions? Prof. Bain, and others.
 British Architects, 8.—The Arab House in Cairo, Count d'Haut.
 Royal Institution, 8.—The Natural History of Society, Mr. A. Lang.
 Civil Engineers, 8.—Annual General Meeting.
 Zoological, 8.—Collection of Acarines from Algeria, Mr. A. D. Michael; Anatomy of Edicæ neoplenis, Mr. F. E. Bedford; Mammals collected by Dr. Emin Pasha, Mr. O. Thomas.
 Wed. Entomological, 7.
 Cyrenaicodion, 8.—The Settlement of Brittany, Mr. W. Edwards.
 Shorthand, 8.—Scientific Shorthand Alphabet, Mr. J. Neville.
 Geological, 8.—As to certain "Changes of Level" along the Western shores of Italy, Mr. E. G. M. Brown; North-Italian Bryozoa, Mr. A. W. Waters; The Borrowdale Plumbago, its Mode of Occurrence and Probable Origin, Mr. J. Forthwaite; Mode of Occurrence and Distribution of the Nickel-Iron Alloy "Awaruite," and the Rocks of the District on the West Coast of the South Island of New Zealand in which it is found, Prof. G. H. F. Ulrich.

- Wed. British Archaeological Association, 8.—Barholme Church, Lincolnshire, and its Bearing on so-called Saxon Architecture, Mr. J. T. Irvine.
 Thurs. Royal Institution, 8.—Famine and Explosives, Prof. Dewar.
 Royal, 4.—Election of Fellows.
 Archæological Institute, 4.—An Inscribed Hittite Seal, purchased by the Rev. Greville I. Chester at Smyrna. Rev. Prof. Sayce; Notes on some Museums in Galicia and Transylvania, Mr. Y. Haverfield; Description of a Weight, Mr. J. L. André; Brasses in the Parish Churches of Wilkesden, Great Greenford, and Acton, Mr. H. S. Cowper.
 Linnean, 8.—Collection of Plants from Madagascar, Mr. G. F. S. Elliot; Dr. Weismann's Theory of Heredity applied to Plants, Prof. G. Henslow; Teratological Evidence as to the Heredity of Acquired Conditions, Prof. B. C. A. Winsie.
 Chemical, 8.—Note on the Preparation of Pure Crystalline Copper, Mr. C. C. Duncan.
 Antiquaries, 8.—Election of Fellows.
 Fri. Physical, 8.—Effect of Change of Temperature on the Villard Critical Point of Iron, Mr. H. Tomlinson; Diurnal Variation of the Magnet at Kew, Messrs. W. G. Robeson and S. W. J. Smith.
 Geologists' Association, 8.—Pebble and Sandy Beds overlying the Woolwich and Reading Series on and near the Addington Hills, Mr. H. M. Kjaarsen; Auriferous Series of Nova Scotia, Mr. G. F. Monkton; An Instance of Recent Erosion near Stirling, Mr. H. W. Monkton.
 Philological, 8.—The Linguistic Value of the Irish Annals, Dr. W. Stokes.
 Royal Institution, 9.—The Search for Coal in the South of England, Prof. W. Boyd Dawkins.
 Sat. Royal Institution, 3.—Ballad Music of the West of England, Rev. S. Baring-Gould.

Science Gossip.

PROF. STEWART, of the Royal College of Surgeons, has been elected President of the Linnean Society in the room of Mr. Carruthers, whose term of office has expired.

PROF. HUXLEY was the recipient of the Linnean Medal at the anniversary meeting of the Linnean Society on Saturday last. This medal was instituted three years since, with a view of conferring honour on distinguished biologists. On the first occasion, which was the centenary celebration of the Society, two medals were bestowed, one on Sir Richard Owen, the other on Sir Joseph Hooker. Last year the award was made to a botanist, Prof. Alphonse de Candolle. This year zoology is recognized in the person of Prof. Huxley. In replying to the President, Prof. Huxley said the aim of his life had been, in the words of the motto of the Society, "Naturæ discere mores." He had endeavoured to show the fundamental unity of plant life and of animal life; to make use of hypotheses as ladders or scaffolds to be discarded, perhaps somewhat ungratefully, when no longer of use; and to pursue truth regardless of incidental consequences.

The University of Oxford has at last made up its mind to definitely appoint a deputy professor to fill the Linacre Chair of Physiology.

THE annular eclipse of the sun on the 17th prox. will only be central over portions of Northern Africa and Southern Asia. Over the whole of Europe a partial eclipse will be visible; at Greenwich 0.37 of the sun's diameter will be obscured when the phase is greatest, at twenty-three minutes past 9 o'clock in the morning. The planet Mercury will be at its greatest western elongation from the sun on the morning of the 24th. Venus is now very brilliant in the evening in the constellation Gemini, and will be about 5° due south of Pollux on the 13th prox. Mars is also very bright in Scorpio, being on the meridian now about half-past 11 in the evening, and by the end of June about 9. Jupiter is still in Capricornus, rising now about 11 o'clock in the evening, and earlier each night; whilst Saturn continues to attract attention in the constellation Leo, not far from Regulus, until it sets about midnight.

WE regret to announce the death of Dr. Herman Schultz, which took place at Stockholm on the 8th inst., in the sixty-seventh year of his age. Dr. Schultz was for many years connected with the observatory at Upsala, of which he became Director, as well as Professor of Astronomy at the University, in 1878, but retired from it in 1888. His astronomical publications are numerous, but that by which he is best known is his "Micrometrical Observations of Five Hundred Nebulae," published (in the English language) in 1874, after having been presented to the Royal Society of Upsala. He was elected an Associate of our Royal Astronomical Society in 1882.

THE death is announced of the well-known Genevese physicist M. Soret on May 13th.

FINE ARTS

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.—The ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTEENTH EXHIBITION IS NOW OPEN. —5, Pall Mall East, from 10 till 6.—Admission, 1s.; Catalogue, 1s. ALFRED D. FRIPP, R.W.S., Secretary.

The LEGEND of the BRIAR ROSE, painted by E. BURNÉ JONES, A.R.A.

The LEGEND of the BRIAR ROSE.—The EXHIBITION of Mr. BURNÉ JONES'S Four Pictures is NOW OPEN at Messrs. Thos. Agnew & Sons' Old Bond Street Galleries, 39, Old Bond Street, W. —Admission, 1s. 10 to 6 o'clock.

THE SALON.

(Second and Concluding Notice.)

M. GÉRÔME'S contribution to the Salon is limited to two very small pictures, owing, doubtless, to his having been at work on his 'Tanagra' (which I shall notice later on among the sculpture). Both pictures were inspired by his recollections of the East. In Abreuvoir (No. 1036) we have a bit of Arab life and architecture—a piece of wall entirely covered with polychrome decorations, and in front of it a large stone trough, out of which some camels are drinking, while their masters are sitting on the ground eating their frugal repast. La Pour-suite (1035) represents a lion pursuing a herd of gazelles. These small compositions are the work of a keen observer, and are elegantly, if somewhat drily executed. The desert through which the gazelles are seen flying constitutes a noble landscape, and presents a very curious effect. The arrangement of the successive planes and the treatment of light recall the peculiar manner of Decamps.

M. Jules Breton exhibits two female studies which reveal the master's well-known qualities, but possess no great originality. La Lavandière (341) is seen walking at a quick pace along the bank of a river, her body slightly thrown backward, and one arm raised to support a basket full of clothes, which she is carrying on her head. This is not the first time that M. Jules Breton has painted this robust peasant woman, who stands out in profile against a green landscape all aglow with the setting sun. There is more expression and sentiment in his Dernières Fleurs (340), in which we find the same search after art, but more discreetly veiled by a pervading emotion. In a small and rustic country garden, white with the first snow of the season, and lighted with pale autumnal sunshine, a young girl is seen cutting some belated flowers, which appear to have been already bitten by the cold. She looks sad as she gathers in this farewell harvest. There is a tinge of melancholy over this little episode of country life, which the painter has rendered with remarkable truthfulness and sobriety.

M. Brozik, who attracted much notice at the Universal Exhibition by his great historical picture, 'La Défenestration de Prague,' has sent a tableau de chevalet to the Salon, Causerie de Paysannes devant une Ferme, Normandie (374). Some women are seated and grouped around the doorway of a Normandy farm. The composition of this picture is correct, the drawing is firm, and all the figures, especially the heads, are carefully studied. As a whole, however, it is somewhat cold; the figures require more life and movement, and the landscape more sunshine.—Madame Demont-Breton, in her picture called Au Jardin (737), has painted two children playing near a stone seat in a ray of sunlight—a somewhat flat composition. There was more feeling and individuality in the works Madame Demont exhibited at the preceding Salons.

In Les Brûleuses d'Herbes (12), by M. Adan, some peasant women are seen gathering dry grasses with pitchforks and rakes, and piling them up over a fire, in whose smoke they are enwrapped as in a floating mist. Their silhouettes stand out against a sky already darkened by the coming night, and recall forcibly—though with less power and originality—some of M. Jules Breton's scenes of rural life.

I must not forget to mention Le Départ (735), by M. Adrien Demont, and La Vache Blanche (851), by M. Julien Dupré.—M. Henry Pinta, a former prix de Rome, who has recently returned from Italy, has sent in a Sainte Marthe (1924). Under the pretext of portraying the legend of St. Martha and the Tarasque the painter has amused himself with contrasting a nude woman with one clothed in velvet and silk. These rich stuffs are painted in very warm tones and with much dash and brilliancy.

The Salon contains a number of fine portraits. M. Paul Dubois's *Portrait de Madame * (822), and his portrait of a very young man, *Portrait de M. * (823), are works of the highest order. This great master has never been more happily inspired.—M. Bonnat has exhibited a lady's portrait (266) and the portrait of the President of the Republic (267), two very fine pieces of painting, in which, however, sincerity is carried almost to brutality, and from which all idealism is systematically excluded.—The portrait of M. A. F. G. (1438), by Jules Lefebvre, is one of the best in the Salon, and is very superior for its modelling and general scale of colours to the same master's large canvas of which I spoke in my former article.—M. Henner presents us with a creature of his imagination (Melancolie, 1193), which might well pass for a portrait; and, on the other hand, he shows us a portrait (Portrait de Madame Roger Midos, 1194) which looks like a fantastical creation, so much parti-pris is there in the conception of the subject and in the contrast between the flesh-tones—which look like ivory—and the brownish-red background. Given this parti-pris, however, no one can deny that M. Henner's two pictures are works of great distinction, which captivate and charm the spectator to no small degree.

Mr. Alma Tadema is so well known to the readers of the Athenæum that there is no need to give an appreciation of his talent in these pages. The fine portrait of M. Jules de Soria (26), which he has sent to the Salon of the Champs Élysées, has attracted much notice. It is a work of great distinction, revealing also a very marked personality. In point of execution it differs totally from the methods of our contemporary school, and nothing is more interesting than to compare this portrait with those of M. Bonnat. It would be difficult, indeed, to seek to render the human face on canvas by more widely opposite means, yet with a final result of such force and truthfulness.

M. Munkacsy exhibits a female portrait, Portrait de Madame B., Princesse S. (1765), painted in the same clear and brilliant tones as his great picture. The pink and white flesh and the straw-coloured gown stand out well defined against some hangings in the background; a lacquer cabinet and some large green plants are painted in very warm tones. This picture recalls the manner of M. Makart more than it resembles M. Munkacsy's former portraits.—M. Fantin-Latour has painted a young girl in a creamy white dress trimmed with rose-coloured guipure. Her large round hat, of a dark brown and covered with feathers, shows her hair frizzing all about her forehead (Portrait de Mlle. S. Y., 890). The expression of the face is full of life, and the ensemble is most harmonious and of a quiet and true colour.

I cannot omit to mention M. Loewe-Marchand's full-length portrait of a young girl, *Portrait de Mlle. * (1528), in a red gown and red jacket against a red wall, the whole very harmoniously blended, and of a firm and sober touch; another portrait of a young girl—in a black gown and black hat—by Machard, Portrait de Mlle. E. P. (1561); a portrait of a lady by M. Muraton (1768), very elegantly drawn, but spoiled by a disagreeable effect of light; and a portrait by M. Félix Barrias, Portrait de Madame

W. S. (107), which shows us a woman in a rose-coloured gown sitting before an easel, very pleasing in colour, but somewhat loosely executed.—Finally, M. Aimé Morot's Portrait de Mlle. M. G. (1745), a small picture, is one of the chief attractions of the Salon. A very young girl, her head covered with a velvet cap, her hair falling about her shoulders, is seen riding along an avenue through some woods, on a tall bright bay horse. The head is charming from its expression of high spirits and excitement, and this small and exquisite picture is altogether treated with much wit and spirit.

Fine landscapes are extremely numerous, and the only fault I find with them is that they resemble those of the last Salon too closely. I must, however, make an exception in favour of M. Bernier, whose picture Huttes de Sabotier (178) seems to strike a new note. He shows us women grouped in front of a hut, under some great trees in a forest. The light, veiled by a morning mist, falls softly through the foliage of the trees, a charming effect, and most delicately rendered.—M. Harnpignies has sent in two pictures, Crépuscule, Souvenir de l'Allier (1173), and Prairie, Effet de Soleil (1174). The first of these landscapes is a truly magnificent piece of painting, the execution of which is both very broad and very precise. A few large trees, a small pond, the sun going down on the horizon and lighting with its last glow some tall grasses and the lower branches of the trees—such is the composition which the master has so admirably combined and arranged. The second subject is much more simple, one solitary tree standing in a meadow flooded with light.—M. Pelouse in his two landscapes, Bords de la Seine (1866) and La Seine, à Poses (1867), seems to have been less happily inspired than in his last year's work. The first picture is somewhat disconnected as a composition, and of a dull aspect. The second is brighter, but is wanting in originality.—In La Moisson (1982) M. Quignon repeats his old subject of ripe corn. Two years ago he showed us the same field, the same ears of wheat gilded by the same sunshine, and the same harvest, with this difference only, that he then represented his sheaves standing upright, whereas this time they are laid on the ground.

M. Jan-Monchablon's landscape Les Vernes (1265) is equally undistinguishable from his pictures of preceding years.—M. Péraire, in his Marais, Environs de Corbeil (1879), shows the same fidelity to sunless landscapes.—There is more originality and more sunshine and life in M. Petitjean's landscape, Joinville, Haute-Marne (1901), in which the little town is seen with its tiled roofs and its trees gaily reflected in the water.—M. Zuber (2476) is not particularly successful in his effect of sunset on a pond, somewhat in the manner of Turner.—M. Yon (2465-2466); M. Pezant (1905-1906); M. Dufour, Les Martiques en Provence (840) and La Seine à Vétheuil (841); and M. Charles Davis, Le Ruisseau, Effet du Soir (687), and Une Matinée d'Été (688), have all exhibited most pleasing landscapes, which, however, have often been described before, and offer the visitor no unexpected interest or pleasure.

Our school of sculpture is not less complete and brilliant than in former years. Unfortunately, Paul Dubois, Guillaume, and Mercié are represented by busts only. On the other hand, we have two important figures by Chapu. The one is intended for a memorial tombstone (Monument de Flaubert, 3650), and represents a woman, writing, seated before a rock, in which the face of the writer is chiselled in medallion. The woman is robust in appearance and somewhat heavily shaped, as befits the muse of Flaubert. The head has a charming expression. The Danseuse (3651) is a standing figure, thinly veiled in draperies which reveal all the forms of the body. The head, which is slightly thrown back, is full of life and most delicately treated. It is a work of rare elegance and of the finest modelling.—M. Delaplanche has executed in marble a funeral monument to Cardinal Donnet, which is to be placed in the Cathedral at Bordeaux (3762). The Cardinal is represented kneeling on a cenotaph in black marble; on the right and on the left are female figures which symbolize Faith and Charity. The latter is of a most beautiful execution, and is draped with much art and knowledge.

La Femme au Paon (3840), by Falguière, reveals all the great qualities of the master. It is a supremely elegant figure of a very modern character.—M. Gérôme's Tanagra (3923) is carefully studied and worked out, and shows a curious preconception of archaism. The artist has thought fit to give a delicate tint to his marble, a reconstitution of the antique which is more interesting as a curiosity than it is pleasing to the eye.

To sum up, the numerous statues and busts which fill the Great Hall of the Palais de l'Industrie testify to a large sum of talent, of acquired knowledge, and of natural taste; and I am strongly impressed with the fact that in this branch of art there is a unity, and what we should call a tenue, which are no longer to be found in painting, and which indicate the existence of a "school"—in the full sense of the word—that has found its proper path, and has no doubts or hesitation as to the aim it has to pursue. FERDINAND DUVAL.

WESTMINSTER HALL.

THE hoarding before the west side of Westminster Hall was taken away last week, and now the public can judge of the work which has been done and of the wisdom of those who protested against it when it was first proposed. The objections to the scheme were partly archaeological and partly architectural. It was contended that the so-called "restoration" was a fraud, and that as a treatment of the front of the Palace of Westminster it was a blunder. The arguments are printed at length with the report of the "Select Committee appointed to examine and report on plans for the Restoration of the Exterior of Westminster Hall"—so it was officially called—and an impartial reading of the evidence shows that, in spite of much assertion and some well-known architectural names on the other side, the objectors succeeded, at least, in maintaining their archaeological position—first, that there was nothing to show that anything like the proposed "restoration" had ever been in the place before; secondly, that the west side of the hall had, from before the days of Richard II., been covered by other buildings and had never been treated as an architectural front; and, thirdly, that, even had it not been so, and if it could be shown that the "restoration" exactly represented a former condition of the building, its reproduction now would be a falsification of history and, under the altered condition of the surroundings, a gross architectural solecism.

The Committee, no member of which, except the late Mr. Beresford Hope and Mr. Dick Peddie, was by previous training prepared for the understanding of the matters to be brought before them, ended, as such committees generally do, with a compromise. They recommended for adoption a new "restoration" of the west side of the hall which Mr. Pearson had prepared, and which left the objections to the first "restoration" just as they were, but they decided against an equally unsatisfactory treatment which he had proposed for the north front. For this, at least, we may be thankful.

It is five years since the Committee reported. Meanwhile the work has been going on, and an occasional protest has been made as the material presentment of the scheme in solid masonry has opened the eyes of men whom the arguments of the objectors failed to reach. The miserable staircases which have been intruded into the hall, and the still more miserable beasts that adorn them, are already a by-word; and we shall not have to wait long to hear enough about the practical convenience of the two ranges of rooms, for which uses have had to be found since the evolution of the "restoration," the horse shelter entered by a steep gradient and a sharp turn, and the gloomy grand committee room over it, placed in the midst of noisy traffic, because, forsooth, Mr. Pearson and his backers are pleased to call it a "restoration" of the Exchequer building which stood on the site five hundred years ago.

That the whole "restoration" is not only improbable, but impossible, has been abundantly shown by the antiquaries. None the less, all the inconveniences and absurdities of the new work have their origin in the pretence of reproducing what is gone. All the pains and trouble of which Mr. Pearson's report to the Committee is evidence has resulted in a disastrous failure, which he might have avoided if he had let himself think and act as an architect, which he is, instead of posing as an antiquary, which he is not.

Looking at the matter from the architectural side, it is impossible to imagine a worse treatment. Notwithstanding its ancient memories, the Westminster Palace of to-day is the work not of William Rufus or Richard II., but of Sir Charles Barry. Until the fire in 1834 the building was theirs, and the conditions of the site, though much modified, were still generally those of the Middle Ages, and the great hall was the centre round which clustered other buildings of different dates, and each architecturally independent of the rest. Barry, having to meet new wants and working under new conditions, made his building one. The hall saved from the fire was, of course, kept, and worked in with the rest, of which it became a part, but not the most conspicuous part, as it had been before. Its comparative lowness made that impossible. But the plan was very skilfully arranged, so that the hall would have kept its supremacy within New Palace Yard, where, being seen only from short distances, its bulk and the largeness of its parts would have compensated for its want of height, and at the same time would not have dwarfed the "scale" of the new work, as, except in the enclosure of a court, it must have done.

It should be remembered that Barry intended to mask the west flank of the hall by a range of buildings, beginning at St. Stephen's porch and running along St. Margaret's Street, and that the range was to continue to and along Bridge Street as far as the Clock Tower, thus completing the enclosure of New Palace Yard. The old law courts stood in the way of part of this, and Parliament decided that the enclosure of the yard should be abandoned. That it will be done some day we are convinced, and agree with one of the witnesses before the Select Committee, who, being pressed by Mr. Shaw Lefevre to give an opinion as to the alternative in case of Parliament determining finally that it should not be done, advised waiting till Parliament should change its mind. The additional accommodation which the abandoned buildings would supply is said to be wanted, and the architectural necessity of them must in the end be recognized. The present just completed blunder will probably do much to convince men of that.

The great architectural defect of the rebuilt Palace of Westminster is that from the side from which it is oftenest approached and seen it appears to stand in a hole. This is not Barry's fault, but comes of the modern streets being some feet above the level of the floor of Westminster Hall, which was fixed eight centuries ago. As the hall remains the chief entrance to the House of Commons, it has to be got down to in some way; and, as the place is now, the descent appears in all views from the north-west, and the building seems to stand at the bottom of it. But if the yard were enclosed by buildings the whole fall would be within it, and the defect would no more appear on that side of the palace than it did in Old Palace Yard so long as the law courts stood. The newly finished work instead of mending the defect has made it ten times worse. Before, the building appeared at the bottom of a slope; now it is in a pit so deep that its parapet wall is higher than the tops of the windows of the ground floor; and it has been extended even to Old Palace Yard.

But this is not the worst. The affectation of building for our ancestors instead of for ourselves, which is called "restoration," has led to the use of a design than which it would be impossible to conceive one worse fitted to the place. True, it is quite unlike anything they did in their time, or would have done if by chance they had worked under our conditions. But it is the pretence of imitating them that has put Westminster Hall into an area eight feet below the street, crowned its wall with a battlement, and flanked it with a range of huge and clumsy pinnacles, which could not have done the business more effectually had they been designed for the express purpose of destroying the apparent size of the building. The injury to the modern building is even more disastrous. St. Stephen's porch, which used to appear one of the most charming pieces of architecture in the world, attracts no longer; and from every point of view, from the corner of Great George Street to that of Abingdon Street, this new "restoration" stands out as a greater blot than ever the old law courts did.

Mr. Shaw Lefevre in 1882, when advocating what has now been done, said that it would be interesting to see how it would "harmonize with the general outline and elaborate ornamentation of the new Houses of Parliament." Well, now he may see it; but the price paid for the entertainment is heavy.

MINOR EXHIBITIONS.

WE have now an opportunity for criticizing Mr. Poynter's fine and powerful picture of The Meeting of Solomon and the Queen of Sheba, which we have more than once mentioned. It is exhibiting at Mr. McLean's gallery in the Haymarket. The scene of the meeting is a stately hall, of architecture approximating in form and colour more closely to Assyrian than Egyptian types, but bearing distinct traces of Egyptian influence. We see two sides of a hall open to the sky, and adorned with double rows of lofty and massive columns. In front of the row on our right, the throne of the monarch is placed on an elevated platform approached by a wide flight of steps of easy grading, and covered with splendid carpets. The steps reach far into the hall, and are guarded by the legendary lions of dark gold placed two and two, a pair on each step, and on either side of the perron. Solomon is attired in purple and white; he wears his crown and carries his long sceptre. He advances from his seat to welcome the tall and slender Balkis, who holds lotus flowers in her left hand, and wears a costume which is distinctly Indian. She is ascending the steps, and casts down her eyes like a bride advancing to her groom. Saluting the monarch by gently bending her head and knees, she moves to accept the chair he indicates to her, placed at the side of his own throne of ivory and gold. With her right hand she points to the attendants who, loaded with gifts of precious stones, spices, and rare monkeys, have followed her to the foot of the steps, and there kneel along with a black chamberlain between two charming girls bearing fans. Solomon, who is still in the prime of life, tall and black-bearded, returns the salutation of Balkis with majestic grace. These dignified and noble figures are worthy of the painter, whose sense of style they manifest even more than do the beauty and fine features of the subordinate personages. A company of chamberlains and others, all splendidly attired, fill the right of the picture. At the side of the perron, near the front on our right, is a table loaded with gorgeously coloured fruits, flowers, and vessels of gold; near this are seen two magnificient peacocks, the painting of which is a technical triumph. The steps and the floor of the hall are of white marble, the warm colour of which harmonizes with the golden lions, sumptuous carpets, gifts, costumes, and arms, as well as the deep red and gold of the columns, the cool whiteness of their entablature, the luminous atmosphere which fills the place, and the splendour of the hangings about the throne. The picture is admirably finished throughout, rich in the fruits of taste and rare research, and as splendid as it is elegant in a serious way, original, and sympathetically poetic. Among Mr. Poynter's works it is second only to 'Venus visiting Æsculapius,' which is at South Kensington.

At Messrs. Dowdeswell's may be seen a large picture by Mr. F. W. Lawson, representing the lobby of the House of Commons in 1884, at the moment when the Speaker is passing before a group of distinguished members. The effect of sunlight on the figures and architecture is well managed, and the whole, though somewhat painty and rough, is acceptable, chiefly on account of the clever, if somewhat superficial way in which many of the likenesses have been "hit off." In the same room hangs the very different production of Mr. W. H. Bartlett, called A Saturday Evening at the Savage Club. Of this it may also be said that the likenesses are true in a superficial way, but the coarseness of the execution and many passages of dirty colour do not improve them. Both pictures are, we understand, to be "carried further" and engraved in photogravure.

At the Royal Arcade Gallery, Old Bond Street, are nearly eighty pictures in water colours by Mr. Nelson Dawson, who has distinguished himself at the Academy this year. They are studies on the coasts and at sea, rather sketchy, yet brilliant, varied, natural, and harmonious. Those which please us most are Jetsam (No. 2), sunlight on pale yellow and smooth sands; A Land-locked Harbour (3), a capital rendering of colour and light on old, rough, and white-washed, time-stained buildings; The Sands of Wareham Water (12); Low Tide, Polperro Harbour (24); Making for Home—Steam Trainers (28); Summer Weather, North Cornwall (32); Constantine Bay (44); Under the Land (47), a fine study of chalk cliffs and the sea; Scarborough Smacks going to Sea (67); and Porth Isaac (78).

What Mr. R. Dunthorne calls "William Strang's Etched Work" is to be seen at the Rembrandt Head, Vigo Street, and consists of 149 examples, most of which we have seen before. It is with pleasure that we notice that the etcher is still striving vigorously to attain that power of draughtsmanship in outlining finely and learnedly and choicely modelling the surfaces of his subjects, which are chiefly human, the absence of which from his plates we have more than once lamented. Even now it is a pity so sympathetic, if somewhat narrow and hidebound, a delineator of tone—to which Mr. Strang devotes himself without much regard to the chiaroscuro of colour as obtaining in nature—produces examples which, to technically trained eyes, are renderings of monochrome in monochrome, and not, except in a narrow sense, instances of chiaroscuro with its indications of colour at all. Now chiaroscuro is the very mystery of mysteries in etching. Many of the old etchers and all the first-rate modern practitioners of the art of the needle-point, such as Rajon, Jacquemart, Waltner (at his best), and Steinheil, excel in this complex, difficult, and delicate attainment. As a student of light and shade Mr. Strang takes a high place; his exercises in that line are firm, rich, highly intelligent, and researchful. As a designer he inclines to the grotesque, and does not fear horrible and ugly themes. In this respect he is a veritable Callot or Goya. Apart from this his taste wants the chastening influence of higher studies in the nobler types of thought and beauty. Although his vigorous sense of what is somewhat loosely and feebly called the "romantic" side of design is worthy of the highest praises that can be given to art of the sort, we crave from him illustrations of the purer as well as the softer graces of the idyllic and lyric moods, such as are conspicuously absent in this collection, where a few somewhat vulgar instances might as well—unless, indeed, the whole mass must needs be shown—be omitted. As there is no room for further comments in illustration of our praises and regrets, we must perforce be content with naming in the order of the catalogue some of the best things in this highly interesting exhibition. These are The Hailstorm (No. 1); The Soup Kitchen (9); Frontispiece to 'The Brownie of Badenoch' (14); 'I'll berry your Crap by the Light o' the Moon' (20); The Sieve Mender (28); 'Grim Death had clasped her Wean' (36); Sorrow (42); Poverty (50); and The Head of a Peasant (128), an evil, vicious, and false face in a felt cap, delineated with rare power.

At Messrs. Dowdeswell's may be seen a very numerous and, to lovers of the kind of decorations they illustrate, exceedingly interesting collection of Indo-Persian pictures and manuscripts, principally of the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, and by native craftsmen, collected by Col. H. B. Hanna.

NEW PRINTS.

FROM MESSRS. P. & D. COLNAGHI we have received a proof, signed by Mr. J. D. Miller, the engraver, of a plate after Greuze's picture 'The Doves,' the property of Mr. R. S. Holford. It is an exceptionally pure and modest design. The engraver has reproduced the face and its choice expression with felicity; the hands, bare knees, arms, and shoulder are delicate and true. The sole defect of the print is a slight lack of breadth in the drapery, the folds of which are somewhat over-defined, so that this portion of the print is a little cut up. If the drapery were made broader by slightly darkening it the whiteness of the dove would be increased and the whole simplified. The picture was No. 86 at the Academy in 1887, and seems to be Smith's No. 4, Supplement; it was probably sold with Mr. T. Emmerson's collection in 1829 for 65*l.* 5*s.*

Mr. H. Dickinson has sent us an "artist's proof" of a large etching by Mr. L. B. Phillips, representing in bright, calm, clear weather the riverside fortress of Josselin, on the Oust, built by Alain VIII., Vicomte de Josselin, in the fourteenth century. The etching is brilliant, homogeneous, and effective, because Mr. Phillips has just feeling for light and tone. The foreground is a little weak, and needs the simplicity larger elements would give, and more finish.

We are indebted to Messrs. Frost & Reed, of Clare Street, Bristol, for artist's proofs of five mezzotint engravings of merit and beauty, and full of sentiment, by Mr. John Finnie, whose previous works of the kind we have commended. Three of the new instances illustrate passages in the Laureate's lyric called 'The Brook,' which famous stream Mr. Finnie thinks larger than most of us fancy. His manner of mezzotinting errs from excess of darkness, and he obtains force of effect by sacrificing light, not brilliancy, clearness, nor breadth.

I steal by lawns and grassy plots

—the placid stream between low wooded banks which, beyond a curving reach, are crowned by a group of trees, while the sunset glows in the sky, flushing the evening clouds—is, apart from the excess of darkness to which we have referred, poetical, finely massed, and delicately finished. In a lesser degree

I chatter over stony ways

(the full stream, gliding fast among boulders in its gravelly bed, suggests an impending storm, and the lingering daylight struggles amid the clouds) has many good qualities, and deserves much the same praise as the first etching.

I make the netted sunbeams dance is thoroughly poetical, but its darkness of tone mars our impressions of a brilliant sun upon the little cascade, the smooth and level stream above it, where vapours that are intended to be saturated with light hide the further bank, the monumental trees, and the distant water. "He toucheth the Hills, and they smoke," is a telling and impressive vista of a stream, the nearer part of which roars in a deep and narrow cascade, while from the high, wooded hillsides dense vapours fly athwart the scene. 'St. John's, Chester,' is an impressive moonlight scene; the huge tower, which no longer exists, appears in the middle above vast heaps of foliage whose topmost boughs look like tracery against the cloudy sky. The Dee is divided between the gloomiest and the most splendid reflections.

From the Librairie de L'Art we have received a vigorous etching, somewhat black and heavily touched, by M. Giroux, after 'Le Chat Malade' by M. Ribot, an artist's proof impression with the remarque (a flower), showing a consultation over the patient, who lies in his anxious mistress's lap while the female physician who has been entrusted with the case feels pussy's pulse, and is as oracular as if she had taken no end of degrees. The faces are decidedly good; the satire is not too obvious, yet it is genuine; the modelling of the flesh, by powerful strokes and excellent draughtsmanship of the Frank Hals kind, is noteworthy. From the same office comes a good, solid, and spirited etching, an artist's proof with three remarques (a ram's head, two lines of music, and a recumbent dog), by M. Salmon, after Mlle. R. Bonheur's world-renowned masterpiece 'Le Labourage Nivernais.' It is masculine and firmly drawn, translates the sterling energy of the original, and so far as it goes, which is not quite to perfection, is most valuable.

THE EXCAVATIONS AT MEGALOPOLIS.

May 12, 1890.

OUR work during the past fortnight falls into three sections: (1) The completion of the draining of the theatre. (2) The trial of some new sites in the neighbourhood of the theatre, all of which have proved disappointing. A long trench has been dug west of the great conglomerate altar (vide earlier reports) on the chance of discovering a corresponding temple, but has found nothing. (3) The digging of a magnificent horseshoe trench, which has laid bare the entire outer edge of the orchestra with the lowest line of seats. These seats are of a kind superior to the rest. They are long benches, nine in number, one corresponding to each κέρκις, or wedge, of the auditorium. Each is provided with an arm at either end, and they have high backs, slightly curved, and fitting most comfortably to the back.

These benches are separated by eight gangways, leading to the κλίμακες above, and there is also a κλίμαξ at either end; thus (below the διάζωμα, at any rate) the number of κλίμακες is ten.

Below these benches (θρόνοι) is an ὀχετός, or channel to carry off the water, and beyond that a raised stone border bounding the orchestra. All these are in almost perfect preservation.

The stone border reminds one of that at Epidaurus, but, while that at Epidaurus is circular, the circle at Megalopolis is incomplete, extending only so far as the horns of the auditorium on either side.

The greatest interest, however, attaches to the θρόνοι at the bottom, all of which are inscribed.

(a) On the easternmost is the inscription 'Αντίοχος ἀγωνοθετής ἀνέθηκε τοὺς θρόνους πάντας καὶ τὸν ὀχετόν (the ὀχετός mentioned above), in characters which may well belong to the beginning of the third or even to the end of the fourth century. The first three words of this inscription are repeated on the central and westernmost seats.

(b) The five central seats are inscribed with the names of Arcadian tribes to which they were appropriated, in very large letters. The names, read from east to west, are Μαιναλίων, Λυκαίων (cf. Paus. viii. 27, 4, Λυκαῖαι), Παρρασίων, Πανιάτων, Ἀπολλωνιάτων. These names are in very late characters; but the inscription Ἀντίοχος ἀγωνοθεσίας ἀνέθηκε on the central seat, in comparatively early characters, in combination with the late inscription φιλῆς Παρρασίων, proves that the latter was an addition made since the seats were placed in situ.

All these inscriptions are on the front of the seat-backs, facing the orchestra.

(c) On the hinder side of the seat-backs are further inscriptions, apparently of intermediate date. Some of these we have not yet transcribed, as they are only partially cleared. That on the back of the seat inscribed Πανιάτων is Πανίας; but the same correspondence does not prevail throughout.

We propose next to dig a trench right through the orchestra from the central bench to the centre of the stage buildings. This will give us a complete section of the orchestra, and will expose the θυμέλη if that remains in situ. Probably we shall also extend this trench upwards, so as to obtain a perpendicular section of the auditorium.

The theatre at Megalopolis is certainly a very interesting and important one. Its plan is in some respects peculiar; and the almost perfect preservation of its lower portions, as well as of the stage buildings, makes the complete clearance of these parts most desirable. It would also probably be worth while to clear the large stoa behind the stage (described in our report of March 30th). The depth of soil, and the great expense which it involves, make such an undertaking impossible this season; but, if funds are forthcoming, we hope the School will be able to carry it out next year.

W. LORING—W. G. WOODHOUSE.

SALES.

MESSRS. CHRISTIE, MANSON & WOODS sold on the 17th, 19th, and 20th inst. the following, from the collection of Mr. F. W. Cosens. Pictures: A. Schreyer, Bulgarian Carriers, 357l. J. F. Herring, sen., Returning from the Derby, 220l. G. C. Stanfield, The Canareggio, Venice, 136l.; San Giorgio Maggiore, 178l. W. P. Frith, Madame Jourdain discovers her husband at the dinner which he gave to the Belle Marquise and the Count Dorante, 157l.; Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme, 136l.; Coming of Age in the Olden Time, 388l.; Railway Station, 315l. R. Ansdell, Lost, and Found, 162l. J. Phillip, Scotch Lassies going a-Milking, 105l.; La Alameda, 309l.; Doubtful Fortune, 588l.; Presbyterian Catechizing, 399l. W. Holman Hunt, Rienzi rowing to obtain Justice for the Death of his Younger Brother, 157l. T. Faed, The Lady of Shalott, 128l.; From Dawn to Sunset, 745l. S. L. Fildes, Marianina, 210l. Marcus Stone, On the Road from Waterloo to Paris, 420l.; Stealing the Keys, 420l. Sir J. E. Millais, Trust Me, 220l. J. C. Horsley, "Checkmate next Move": Haddon Hall in the olden times, 168l. L. Alma Tadema, Confidences, 451l. J. C. Hook, The Valley on the Moor, 215l. C. Stanfield, Naples, 588l.; Dort, 546l. E. W. Cooke, On the Thames, off Millwall, 346l. D. Roberts, Interior of St. Peter's, Rome, 262l.; Edinburgh, 136l. D. MacLise, The Banquet Scene in 'Macbeth', 315l. Sir F. Leighton, Dante in Exile, 619l. Portrait of Elizabeth of Bohemia when a Child, 52l. Drawings: Luke Fildes (pen-and-ink illustrations to Dickens's 'Edwin Drood'), Mr. Crisparkle is Overpaid; Up the River; Durdles cautions Mr. Sapsea against Boasting; At the Piano; On Dangerous Ground; Jasper's Sacrifices; Mr. Grewgious's Experiences; Mr. Grewgious has Suspicions; In the Court; Sleeping it Off; Under the Trees; and Good-bye, 115l.

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge sold on the 14th, 15th, and 16th inst. the following engravings after Sir Joshua Reynolds. By T. Watson: Mrs. Beresford, Mrs. Gardiner, and Lady Townshend as the 'Sacrifice to Hymen,' first state, 372l. 15s., an extraordinary price, and the highest ever obtained for an engraving after Sir Joshua; Mrs. Crewe, proof before the name, 52l. 10s.; Catherine, Lady Bampfylde, 170l. W. Dickinson: Diana, Viscountess Crosbie, 38l.; Jane, Duchess of Gordon, 15l. J. Dixon: Mary, Duchess of Ancaster, first state, 55l.; The Misses Crewe, undescribed proof, 55l. R. Dunkarton: Mary Horneck, first state, 28l. 10s. E. Fisher: Lady Sarah Bunbury, proof, 56l. 14s.; Lady Elizabeth Compton, first state, 216l. 6s.; Jane, Countess of Harrington, first state, 45l. 3s.; Lady Henrietta Herbert, 34l.; Charlotte, Lady Talbot, first state, 50l.; Ann, Viscountess Townshend, proof before the name, 87l. 3s.; the Ladies Waldegrave, 67l. 4s. J. Grozer: Francis Harris, 26l. J. Jacobé: Miss Mayer as Hebe, 40l. 19s. J. Jones: Miss Kemble, 25l.; another impression, 25l.; Lady Caroline Price, proof, 28l. J. Marchi: Miss Cholmondeley, proof before inscription, 50l. T. Park: Penelope Boothby, 27l. 10s. J. R. Smith: Mrs. Carnac, 39l.; Lady Catherine Pelham Clinton, 30l.; Lady Caroline Montagu, 38l.; Mrs. Musters, 51l. J. Spilsbury: Miss Jacob, proof before any inscription, 54l. 12s. C. Turner: Dilettanti Society, 30l. W. Ward: The Snake in the Grass, first state, 37l. J. Watson: Miss Julia Bosville, proof, 46l.; Catherine Bunbury, 33l. 12s.; Ann, Duchess of Cumberland, first state, 54l.; Miss Greenway, 27l. 6s.; Mrs. Hale as L'Allegro, 30l.; Ladies Sarah Lennox and Susan Strangways and C. J. Fox, 37l. The sale realized 3,634l. 19s., and as the above figures show, the prices throughout were remarkably high.

Fine-Art Gossip.

Knowledge of next Monday will contain an excellent article by Mr. Ranyard on the gateway of Old Square, Lincoln's Inn, the destruction of which, as we said some weeks ago, is being actually proposed by the Benchers, who are especially bound to preserve it. Every one who takes any interest either in architecture or history ought to join in protesting against the causeless destruction of a precious relic of Tudor London, which was the centre of much of the history of the Civil War. At No. 23 of Old Square lived Lenthall the Speaker, and at No. 24 Thurloe, and there Milton and Cromwell must have often visited him, as the Athenæum explained some years back, when it told the story of Morland's discovery of the plot to lure Charles II. to the coast of Sussex.

MESSRS. BOUSSOD, VALADON & Co. exhibit from Monday next a series of water-colour drawings, entitled 'Flirt,' by Madame M. Lemaire. From the 5th to the 20th prox. Messrs. Cassell & Co. will exhibit at the Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street, their collection of original drawings in black and white made by artists of reputation for their various publications, and including examples by Messrs. J. MacWhirter, M. Gow, C. W. Wyllie, G. Browne, J. Fulleylove, H. Hine, J. E. Hodgson, and M. E. Edwards. Mr. Mendoza will exhibit from Monday next 'A Day with the Hounds.'

MR. F. DILLON writes:—

"In February last I received a circular from Mr. Lee Bapty, the manager of the Edinburgh International Exhibition, stating the conditions under which artists could have their works exhibited. Enclosed within the circular there was a paper headed 'Special Invitation,' in which I was requested to exhibit four works. Having filled in the form and informed the agent that I had a picture which I was desirous of exhibiting in Edinburgh, it was sent for in due course. I heard nothing further of the matter until a few days after the opening of the Exhibition, when my work was returned to me without note or comment of any kind. I at once addressed a letter in courteous terms to Mr. Lee Bapty, in which I reminded him of the fact that my picture was sent pursuant to a special invitation, and expressing my surprise that, although I was invited to send four works, the single picture was returned to me, and I then requested an explanation. After the lapse of several days I received a letter from the secretary of the Fine Arts Section informing me that at the last moment a 'consignment' of Belgian pictures had arrived which occupied so much space that they were unable to accept my work, and concluding with the singular statement that they thought this 'best for all parties.' Having a year or two ago met with similar discourtesy at the hands of the manager of the Glasgow Exhibition, I infer that it is the custom north of the Tweed to beguile English artists, under the specious pretence that they are specially invited, into sending their works, from which a selection is made after their reception. Believing that there is no other city in Europe in which such a practice exists or would be tolerated, I beg to submit these facts for the consideration of yourself and your readers, trusting that, through the medium of your widely circulated publication, they may become generally known and commented upon as they deserve."

At the sale of the collection of M. de Porto Riche in Paris on the 14th inst. the undermentioned examples were disposed of: Corot, 'Courances,' 6,600 fr.; 'Après l'Orage,' 6,700 fr. C. F. Daubigny, 'Bords de l'Oise,' 9,500 fr. Diaz, 'L'Île des Amours,' 17,500 fr. Isabey, 'Seigneurs sur la Plage,' 11,500 fr.; 'L'Enlèvement,' 7,500 fr. Meissonier, '1814,' 131,000 fr.; 'Le Hallebardier,' 29,000 fr. T. Rousseau, 'Les Marais,' 16,200 fr.; 'Pêcheur levant ses Filets,' 27,400 fr. Roybet, 'La Confiance,' 6,800 fr.

The names of the French artists Étex, Cabanel, Vigée-Lebrun, F. Millet, F. Bonvin, Carpeaux, and Coysevox have been bestowed upon various streets in Paris.

THE Italian papers record the death at Rome of the Marquis E. T. d'Azeglio, director of the Museo Civico at Milan, a considerable benefactor to the arts of Italy, born at Turin in 1816, and the last of an ancient branch of a distinguished family. The sculptor M. Louis Auvray, founder of the Revue Artistique et Littéraire, and promoter of various publications of similar character, is dead, aged eighty years. He was a frequent exhibitor at the Salons.

THE various Viennese collections of works of art are being gathered in the Kunsthistorisches Hofmuseum. Dr. von Bergmann has already collected all the large objects—statues, sarcophagi, and the like—in the Egyptian Gallery, the walls of which are decorated with copies of the pictures in the tombs at Beni-Hassan, one of the places recently mutilated. The ancient Egyptian columns belonging to the Hofmuseum have been utilized to support the roof of that building. Dr. von Bergmann hopes to have the whole of the collection arranged in the new order before the end of this year. The pictures of the Belvedere will not be removed till 1891.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—'Les Pêcheurs de Perles,' 'Lohengrin,' 'Il Trovatore,' 'Faust,' 'Les Huguenots.' ST. JAMES'S HALL.—Philharmonic Concert.

THE opera season has so far been marked by great activity. In resuming our record we have first to speak of the performance of Bizet's 'Les Pêcheurs de Perles' on Thursday last week. In presenting this opera Mr. Harris acts under compulsion and not from choice, for pretty and tasteful as some of the music is, it is ineffective in a large theatre. M. Dufriche, a new baritone, took the part of Zurga, and displayed a fine voice afflicted by the tremolo to a painful degree. Signor Valero was, on the whole, commendable as Nadir, and Miss Ella Russell sang delightfully as Leila.

On the following evening the management secured a triumph in 'Lohengrin,' for the performance was, on the whole, the finest ever given in London. It displayed ambition, but scarcely rashness, on the part of Miss Macintyre to undertake the rôle of Elsa. She has three important qualifications in her favour—youth, a pleasant appearance, and a sympathetic voice. When to these are added grace of bearing, freedom from self-consciousness, and more passion in the third act, Miss Macintyre will be a perfect exponent of the part. It is simply impossible to overpraise the Lohengrin of M. Jean de Reszke. His voice certainly gains more and more of the true tenor quality, and in presence and alternate dignity and tenderness he is unsurpassable. Wagner's creation has never, so far as our knowledge extends, been so splendidly impersonated as it is at the present time by the accomplished Polish artist. M. Édouard de Reszke has for several years been unapproachable as the King, and Madame Fursch-Madi as Ortrud and Signor d'Andrade as Telramund were worthy of their companions. It is, we suppose, idle to hope for an intelligent observance of Wagner's stage directions, but some advance was noticeable in this respect, and Signor Mancinelli, who conducted, has gained a more accurate idea of the proper treatment of the score since it was first given under his direction in London three years ago.

From this performance to 'Il Trovatore,' as represented on Saturday night, was a terrible descent. That Verdi's melodramatic opera is no longer popular with the general public was manifest by the state of the house, and the performance was calculated to lower it still further in the estimation of intelligent amateurs. The two leading parts were in the hands of new-comers, Madame Tetravini and Signor Rawner. Both came to England with a certain amount of reputation gained elsewhere, but neither justified it to any great extent. The new Leonora has a pleasing appearance and a tolerably sympathetic voice rather limited as to power, and the impression she made was that she would be more acceptable in lighter parts. Signor Rawner affords a striking example of the degradation to which opera has descended in Italy. What his voice might have been had he undergone thorough artistic training cannot be said; but as it is, his sole idea of creating effect is to advance to the footlights and shout a high note in the chest register. The statement that he produced in alt is erroneous, though his c in "Di quella pira" was given with little apparent effort. Both the leading performers indulged in clap-trap devices which it was hoped had been permanently banished from the operatic stage. Signor d'Andrade as the Count and Madame Scalchi as Azucena repeated familiar impersonations.

'Faust' was given for the second time on Monday, with some changes of cast. M. Édouard de Reszke resuming his fine embodiment of Mephistopheles, and Madame Nordica playing the part of Marguerite with her accustomed charm. The Valentine was Signor Franceschetti, a débutant with a fairly good voice, free from tremolo, but a singularly wooden style of acting. It was obvious, however, that Signor Franceschetti was extremely nervous, and it is possible that he may do better on the next occasion.

It cannot be said that the success of the performance of 'Les Huguenots' on Tuesday was made chiefly by the most recent additions to the company. M. Ybos, a Belgian tenor, possesses unquestionably a naturally fine voice, and in appearance and manner a better Raoul de Nangis could not be desired. Unhappily the pernicious vibrato utterly spoils his singing, and at times the effect was that of an imperfect trill rather than a simple sostenuto. Madame Tetravini played with intelligence as Valentine, but she does not possess the physique necessary for the part. Her voice when forced becomes hard and wiry, and the listener could not resist the impression that she was overtaxing her resources. M. Dufriche as St. Bris moderated his tremolo, and was on the whole acceptable. The Marguerite of Miss Ella Russell, the Urbano of Madame Scalchi, and the Nevers of Signor d'Andrade are too familiar to require comment. The finest impersonation, however, was that of Marcel by M. Édouard de Reszke. We doubt if the part has ever been so grandly represented by any other performer, and one could not help regretting when Marcel disappeared from the stage after the third act, as he does in the present version. The excellence of the chorals was manifested throughout the performance, but particularly in the celebrated "Bénédiction des Poignards," which was most impressively rendered.

For once a new work by an English composer has found a place in a Philharmonic programme, the concert of Thursday last week including a composition by Mr. Frederic Cliffe, which he entitles 'Cloud and Sunshine,' an orchestral picture. We are told that the young composer followed Schumann's example in first penning his music according to the ideas that came to him, and then gave it a title that seemed suitable. There is, therefore, no definite programme in the present work, which may be described as an elaborate concert overture. It consists of an extended largo in F sharp minor and an allegro in the same key, in which ordinary symphonic form is strictly observed. In accordance with the title of the piece the subjects are sharply contrasted with one another, the first theme of the principal movement suggesting "clouds," actual or metaphorical, and the second, in A, "sunshine." But it is not in this that the merit of the work chiefly consists. It is full of colour and picturesqueness, the handling of the orchestra showing the influence of modern masters, particularly in the treatment of the brass. The music itself cannot be said to belong to any distinctive school, yet it is masterly, and in every respect worthy to succeed the Symphony in c minor which first drew attention to Mr. Cliffe as a composer. He left the direction of the work in the hands of Mr. Cowen, under whom it received full justice, but he was twice called to the platform at the conclusion of the performance. Madame Sophie Menter's rendering of Weber's Concertstück was very brilliant, but musicians would have been better pleased had she adhered to the composer's text. The necessity for embellishing Weber is not apparent.

Madame Menter's subsequent performance of Liszt's Rhapsodie in F was a noteworthy display of technical ability. The remaining instrumental items in this programme were Brahms's 'Tragic' Overture, Beethoven's Symphony in D, and Gade's overture, 'Nordische Sennfahrt.' Madame Nordica was heard to very great advantage in Beethoven's scena "Ah! perfido," and "Elizabeth's Prayer" from 'Tannhäuser.'

Musical Gossip.

M. PADEREWSKI's audiences continue to increase, his third recital, on Thursday afternoon at St. James's Hall, being very well attended. He was announced to play Beethoven's Sonata in c minor, Op. 111, but he gave instead the Sonata in A flat, Op. 110, his reading of which was very striking, and only marred to a slight extent by affectations. The Polish pianist has yet to prove himself an acceptable exponent of Schumann. His rendering of the 'Carnaval' was original, but for the most part we could not agree with it. The indulgence in the rubato was excessive, and the contrasts were too violent. In the final movement there were several slips in the text, probably due more to momentary forgetfulness or nervousness than to intention. The rest of the programme consisted of minor pieces, in several of which M. Paderewski created great effect. We shall be glad to hear him in connexion with an orchestra at his concert on June 10th.

As Mr. Santley will not arrive in England in time for the performance of 'St. Paul' at the Crystal Palace on June 21st, the principal part will be taken by Mr. Watkin Mills.

MADAME CARREÑO gave her second pianoforte recital at St. James's Hall on Thursday last week, the principal feature in her programme being Schumann's 'Etudes Symphoniques.' In this great work she evinced perfect mastery of the key-board, and though the interpretation lacked something in sentiment and poetic feeling, the tone was as pure as it was powerful. If there were not so many pianists at present appealing for notice, Madame Carreño would receive more attention than has so far been accorded to her. She gives another recital on June 17th.

CONCERTS were suspended from Thursday of last to Wednesday of the present week, when there were several performances. In the afternoon yet another pianist, M. Pierre René Hirsch, gave a recital at the Princes' Hall. He is a powerful executant, but from the character of his programme and the style of his playing we judge him to be more of a virtuoso than an artist. There was little sensibility in his rendering of some Chopin pieces, but in such items as Liszt's Rhapsodie, No. 12, and the transcription of Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in G minor, M. Hirsch displayed great command over the key-board. He is certainly not the least remarkable of the many pianists now in London.

On the same evening Messrs. Ludwig and Whitehouse commenced another series of chamber concerts at the Princes' Hall. Excellent performances were given of Sgambati's Quintet in B flat, Op. 5, of which we have recently spoken, Spohr's Dramatic Concerto for violin, and Beethoven's Quartet in F, Op. 59, No. 1. The concert-givers were assisted in the concerted works by Miss Zimmermann and Messrs. Collins and Gibson; and Miss Fillunger contributed songs by Schubert and Brahms.

Also on Wednesday evening the Musical Guild commenced another series of chamber concerts at the Kensington Town Hall, their programme containing Schumann's Septet, Schumann's Quartet in E flat, Op. 47, and the same composer's 'Märchenerzählungen' for piano, clarinet, and viola, Op. 132.

THE death of M. Victor Nessler, the opera composer, took place at Strasbourg on Wednesday morning. Born at Baldenheim in Alsace in 1841, Nessler produced his first opera, 'Fleurette,' at Strasbourg in 1864, with such success that he gave up theology, which he had been studying, and devoted himself to music. From that time he produced many works in succession, the most successful being 'Der Rattenfänger von Hameln' and 'Der Trompeter von Säckingen.' Both of these have obtained enormous popularity in Germany, but the first named obtained no success at Covent Garden, where it was performed in January, 1884. To the lovers of simple melody Nessler's music was attractive, but his style was extremely superficial, and his work is by no means likely to endure.

THE revival of the Monday Popular Concerts at Bristol has so far been successful, the loss on the season being so small that no call will be made on the guarantors. An increase of support may therefore be confidently looked for next season.

THE whole of next week at the Theatre Royal, Cardiff, is to be devoted to Welsh national opera. There will be produced for the first time a new opera called 'Arianwen; or, the Fisherman's Daughter,' by Dr. Joseph Parry, whose 'Nebuchadnezzar' was recently given at St. James's Hall. 'Bloduen,' another of his works, is also announced for the occasion.

THERE is a tolerable consensus of opinion among Paris critics and musicians that M. Jeanin Godard's new opera 'Dante' is a failure.

SIGNOR BOITO has accepted the post of director of the Conservatoire at Parma in place of his friend Signor Faccio, whose mental condition is said to have become much worse since the last report.

AMONG the Beethoven relics collected for the museum at Bonn are the ear-trumpets manufactured for the deaf composer by Maelzel, the inventor of the metronome. These instruments were in the Royal Library at Berlin, and have been sent to Bonn by command of the German Emperor.

CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK.

- MON. Miss Marian Davis's Concert, 3, Steinway Hall.
— Mile. Puzzi and Madame Bino's Concert, 3, St. George's Hall.
— Madame Florence Perugini and Miss Amy Hutton's Vocal Recital, 3, 30, Princes' Hall.
— Royal Italian Opera, 8, 'Don Giovanni.'
TUES. Richter Concert, 8, 30, St. James's Hall.
— Concert in Aid of Mrs. E. Cummins, 3, Steinway Hall.
— Herr Willy Hess's Violin Recital, 3, Princes' Hall.
— St. James's Band Concert, 8, Steinway Hall.
— Royal Italian Opera, 8, 'Roméo et Juliette.'
— Mile. Ida Andean's Concert, 8, Princes' Hall.
WED. Madame Frickhausen's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Steinway Hall.
— Mr. Gabriel Thorp's Concert, 8, Steinway Hall.
— Royal Italian Opera.
THUR. Musical Guild Concert, 8, 30, Kensington Town Hall.
— Mr. Orton Bradley's Concert of Brahms's Music, 3, Steinway Hall.
— London Academy Students' Concert, 3, St. James's Hall.
— Philharmonic Concert, 8, St. James's Hall.
— Royal Italian Opera.
FRI. Royal Italian Opera.
SAT. Señor Sarasate's Concert, 3, St. James's Hall.
— Mile. Kriebberg's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Princes' Hall.
— Concert in Aid of St. George's Chapel, Albemarle Street, 3, No. 5, Portland Place.
— Royal Italian Opera.
— Concert in Aid of the Prendergast Home for Ladies, 8, 30, Princes' Hall.

DRAMA

THE WEEK.

HAYMARKET.—Afternoon Performance: 'A Riverside Story,' in Two Acts. By Marie Bancroft.
COMEDY.—'Queen's Counsel,' in Three Acts. By James Mortimer.

MRS. BANCROFT's first essay in the drama may be regarded as a success. The story is trite, and the treatment, especially as regards the extreme length of the first act, displays the faults of inexperience. All is tender and moving, however, and the language is appropriate as well as pleasant. Mrs. Bancroft possesses the courage of her convictions, and does not spoil her moral by seeking to tag a happy termination to a story of wrong. A young gentleman lures from her home and her country lover the prettiest girl in a riverside village, and having effected her ruin leaves her to die of heart-break. With sound judgment the author passes lightly over the painful aspects of the story, and dwells only upon the various forms of heroic but unavailing sacrifice for which opportunity is furnished. A more than usually competent interpretation was afforded this piece, the exponents including Misses Kate Rorke and Annie Hughes, Mr. Sidney Brough, Mr. Leonard Boyne, and Mr. Giddens. No condemnation is, perhaps, merited, but Mr. Brough does not in the least convey the idea of a youth from whom an act of cold-blooded infamy is to be expected.

Mr. Mortimer is in the habit of going for the subjects of his adaptations to the French comedies of a generation ago. It is difficult to count the plays of this period he has brought on to the English stage. His latest addition to the list consists of 'Les Pommes du Voisin' of M. Victorien Sardou, a piece produced at the Palais Royal in 1864, founded on 'Une Aventure de Magistrat,' by Charles de Bernard, and curious as bringing to a head the charges of plagiarism under which at the outset its author suffered. Mr. Mortimer is to be congratulated on having entirely got rid of what was indecorous and saucy in the original. In so doing, however, he has drained it of life blood. Some of the comic spirit is preserved. The tribulations of a legal luminary who, after a career of unblemished virtue, ventures on a timid essay in vice, and finds himself led from step to step until he is guilty of every crime in the calendar, cannot be otherwise than amusing. In the adaptation, however, the vice is not understood, and the whole proceedings are unintelligible. Why the hero—who is not a Queen's Counsel, since he applies for silk and does not get it—should chase Katarina, the heroine, is only less perplexing than why he should not. This being so, the whole structure of supposed crime falls to pieces. Mr. E. M. Robson played with some earnestness the part of the would-be Queen's Counsel or Substitut, first taken by Geoffroy, and other parts were sustained by Misses Lydia Cowell and Marie Lewes and Messrs. Maurice, Cross, and Lugg.

Since the piece was first produced the heroine has been restored to the position of married woman, first assigned her by the adapter, but withdrawn from her at the wish of the management. A great addition to intelligibility results from the change.

Dramatic Gossip.

WE are promised for July a revival of Milman's 'Fazio,' with Miss Ivanowa and Mr. Julian Cross in the principal parts. It was first produced at Bath in 1818, with the ill-starred Conway as the hero and Miss Somerville (Mrs. Bunn) and the Chatterleys in other characters, and is a rather heavy and lugubrious play.

WITH the performance of 'Olivia' for the benefit of Miss Terry, Mr. Irving's season at the Lyceum closes this evening. Mr. Gordon Craig appeared for the first time as Moses, Mr. F. H. Macklin was Mr. Burchell, and Miss Annie Irish, Sophia.

'WANTED A WIFE,' by Mr. J. H. Darnley, produced on Wednesday afternoon at Terry's Theatre, is a bustling, if not very original farce in three acts. In respect of construction and dialogue it is above the level of pieces given under similar conditions, but its characters are not well drawn. Mr. Arthur Williams, Mr. Yorke Stephens, and Miss Helen Leyton played the principal parts.

'ADOPTION,' a one-act piece by Richard-Henry, described as a "Matrimonial Mixture," has been added to the bill at Toole's Theatre. It is founded on a whimsicality from the same pen which appeared in a comic serial, and has a certain amount of quaint drollery. Its interpreters include Miss Marie Illington, Miss Cicely Richards, Mr. Compton Cutts, and other members of the company.

AT the Surrey Mr. Wills's drama of 'Jane Shore' has been played during the week, with Miss Isabel Bateman and Mr. E. Compton in the principal parts.

TWO novelties by Mr. H. Arthur Kennedy were produced on Tuesday afternoon at the Strand Theatre. 'A Throw of the Dice' is a not very successful sketch of the Latin occupation of England, in which Mr. Leonard Outram played Lucius Æmilius, a Roman; Mr. Oswald Yorke, Caradoc; and Miss Gertrude Lovel, Mona. 'The New Wing' is a flimsy farce in three acts, weakly played as a rule, but furnishing Mr. Charles Collette with a character of a bibulous working man, in which he was droll.

MR. GILBERT's 'Comedy and Tragedy,' with Miss Julia Neilson in the part of Clarice, in which she was recently seen at an afternoon entertainment at the Haymarket, is this night added to the regular bill at that theatre.

'THE FAST COACH' has been produced at the St. James's as a prelude to 'Esther Sandraz.'

MISS ADA CAVENDISH (Mrs. Frank Marshall) reappeared on Thursday at the Pavilion as Mercy Merrick in 'The New Magdalen.'

THE long-forgotten grave of the highly endowed actress Madame Christiane Becker (not 'Becher,' as some German papers have it), in whose artistic education Goethe took an active interest, and to whose memory he dedicated his elegy 'Euphrosyne,' has recently been discovered at Weimar. The Goethe Gesellschaft has erected a tombstone on the grave and had it enclosed by an iron railing. Madame Becker died at the age of nineteen in 1797, and in 1800 a monument was erected in her honour in the garden which at one time belonged to Musæus.

NEXT WEEK'S NOVELTIES AND REVIVALS.

- MON. Drury Lane (Morning), Complimentary Benefit to Mrs. E. L. Blanchard.
— Her Majesty's (Evening), Beginning of Season of French Plays, 'La Lutte pour la Vie.'
TUES. Vaudeville (Afternoon), 'In Old Days,' by Mrs. Hodgson and Archibald Hodgson; 'A Buried Talent,' by Louis N. Parker; and 'Picking up the Pieces,' by Julian Sturgis.

[These announcements are subject to changes of plan on the part of managers.]

MISCELLANEA

Savaglia.—In preparing an account of a very fine example of "black coral" I have referred to the early Italian writers. There can be no doubt that it is the "Savaglia" of Ferranti Imperato, whose 'Historia Naturali' was first published in 1599; the "Savaglia" of Ginanni, whose 'Opere Postume' were published in 1755; and the "Savalia Maris Mediterranei" of Pallas. This word is in no Italian dictionary that I have been able to consult, and Prof. Douglas has been unable to obtain any information for me from the officers of the Printed Book Department of the British Museum. Can any reader of the Athenæum throw any light on the origin or meaning of this word? F. JEFFREY BELL.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—T. H.—F. G. A.—J. S. B.—C. K.—A. J. B.—W. B. T.—D. M. B.—J. G.—J. M.—received. No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION BY POST.

	s.	d.
For Twelve Months	15	3
For Six Months	7	8

SATURDAY, JUNE 7, 1890.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
RECENT ESSAYISTS	729
THE JEW IN FICTION	730
AUSONIUS AND HIS EDITORS	731
THE AMERICAN VIEW OF EGYPT	732
THE ORIGIN OF THE ARYANS	732
NOVELS OF THE WEEK	733
LAW BOOKS	735
OUR LIBRARY TABLE—LIST OF NEW BOOKS	735-736
BEATRICE: AN EARLY AMERICAN EDITION OF ELIA; MR. WILLIAM WHITE; LORD LOVAT; THE ORIENTAL CONGRESS; THE HOSPITALIERS IN ENGLAND; SALES; DR. SCHMITZ	736-739
LITERARY GOSSIP	739
SCIENCE—ELEMENTARY TEXT-BOOKS; MR. W. S. DALLAS, F.R.S.; NEW GUINEA; SOCIETIES; MEET- INGS; GOSSIP	740-742
FINE ARTS—THE TOPOGRAPHY OF OLBA; THE INTER- NATIONAL EXHIBITIONS AT GLASGOW AND EDIN- BURGH; SALES; GOSSIP	742-743
MUSIC—THE WEEK; GOSSIP; CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK	744-745
DRAMA—THE WEEK; GOSSIP; NEXT WEEK'S NOVEL- TIES	745-746

LITERATURE

Conversations in a Studio. By William Wetmore Story. 2 vols. (Blackwood & Sons.)
In a Club Corner. By A. P. Russell. (Boston and New York, Houghton, Mifflin & Co.)

It is to the form rather than the substance of Mr. Story's volumes that critics will be inclined to take exception. There is no objection to solid information, but it need not be served up in a conversational dish, designed for kickshaws of a lighter and more digestible description. The late Sir Arthur Helps, indeed, in 'Friends in Council' and 'Social Pressure,' works now strangely neglected, succeeded in investing this particular literary vehicle with a charm which is difficult to analyze; but his secret, whatever it was, seems unfortunately to have died with him. It has assuredly not descended to the writers of the Symposia (shades of Plato and Socrates!) on things sacred and profane which appear from time to time in the pages of the monthly magazines, and should be unhesitatingly avoided by the judicious reader. Nor has it, it is to be feared, been vouchsafed to Mr. Story, whose 'Conversations,' originally printed during a series of years in Blackwood, are now republished in a collected edition by the proprietors of that periodical.

The scene is laid in a studio at Rome; the dramatis personæ are Mallett, a painter, and Belton, his friend. Both, it is said to say, are bores; but Belton is, on the whole, the greater bore of the two. Their habit is to meet at intervals and indulge in an interminable tête-à-tête, in the course of which they break each other's heads with the precious balms of their encyclopædic knowledge. Now it is the difference between the talents of Attica and Ægina, à propos of the price of a picture by Nicias:—

B. How much would 60 talents be?

M. That depends on whether they are Attic or Æginetan talents. An Attic or Euboic talent was about 293*l.* 1*s.*, and an Æginetan talent about 393*l.* 1*s.* Taking the lesser Attic talent in round numbers at 250*l.*, 60 talents would be 15,000*l.*

Or, again, the reader is treated to a dissertation on longevity among the ancients, which extends to no less than five pages, in the following style:—

M. Some of these you have mentioned were mere youths compared with many on the list of the old Greeks that is given by Lucian in his essay entitled Μακροβίαι, in which he enumerates the ages of many of the more celebrated men of antiquity.

B. Pray read me some of them, if you have the book here.

M. With pleasure [!]. In the first place, he speaks of those kings who have attained a great age. Among them is Arganthonius (Rex Tartessorum), who is said to have lived one hundred and fifty years; so at least it is stated by Herodotus and Anacreon, but to Lucian this seems to partake of the fabulous. Cicero only gives him one hundred and twenty years. Then there is Agathocles tyrant of Sicily, who died at ninety-five according to Democharis and Timæus; Hiero tyrant of Syracuse, who died at ninety-two; Antæus, king of the Scythians, who lived more than ninety years; Bardylis, king of Illyria, who fought on horseback in the war against Philip when he was ninety.

And so on, through the Bs and the Cs and the Ds, and the philosophers, historians, orators, and poets of all kindreds, and nations, and tongues. In the two foregoing extracts Mallett is the more loquacious, but Belton is not to be outdone, as witness this disquisition on the pronunciation of the letter C by the Romans:—

B. If Cicero was pronounced Kikero by the Romans, why did they not so spell it? Ch represented with them the same sound as the Greek Chi (χ), and so they spelt the Greek names beginning with χ thus,—Chimera, Chios, Chaon, Chersonesus, &c. Why, if the C in Cicero was pronounced hard, like the χ, was it not written Chichero? Besides, look at the ancient inscription of Duilius, and you will have still stronger support for this opinion.

M. What was the inscription of Duilius?

B. It was an inscription engraved upon the base of the Columna Rostrata, which was struck down by lightning between the second and third Punic Wars, and remained buried in the ruins of Rome until it was unearthed in 1565 near the Capitol. Though considerably defaced in parts, it was legible, and has been carefully restored by learned hands.

Now this, we venture to assert without fear of contradiction, is not literature, unless 'Mrs. Mangnall's Questions' comes under that designation. The proper place for the Æginetan talent, and Arganthonius (Rex Tartessorum), and the Columna Rostrata, and the rest, is a classical dictionary, where we can find them when we want them, which will not, perhaps, be very often. Their appearance in a book that is presumably intended to amuse as well as to instruct must be a great deal more artfully contrived than this, if the author does not wish his readers to fling it down in disgust or fall asleep over it from sheer fatigue.

It would not be right, however, to create the impression that these dust-heaps of miscellaneous intelligence are all that Mr. Story's volumes contain. When he is treating of the art and literature of to-day he can be interesting enough. On such subjects he writes, or talks (if the conversational fiction is to be kept up), with spirit and good sense and in English of commendable purity. His estimate of Mr. Ruskin's position as a leader of thought, if not particularly original, seems to be exceedingly sound:—

"He has done an immense deal of good by his writings. He has stimulated the mind to think. He has brought art over from vague generalities to a real study of nature, which is the true basis of excellence in sculpture and painting. Besides this, he is a poet, and his descriptions of nature in landscape are wonderfully true and subtle. But in his statement of principles he is vague, contradictory, and unphilosophical. He has no system, but many very just observations: no metaphysical accuracy, but a high poetic and critical faculty. It always seems to me as if he were learning his lesson aloud, and correcting his impressions before the public. Still, he speaks as authoritatively when he is beginning to study his lesson as afterwards when he has advanced to a position where he finds what he said is untrue. But he has one great merit. He is honest, bold, and in earnest."

In another passage an undeniably forcible contrast is drawn between the American and the Englishman:—

"The American is slenderer and more nervous in his material organization, more metaphysical in his intellect, more irritable in his temperament than the Englishman. His sharp thin air acts always on him as a stimulus. It will not let him rest, but whips him on. The brilliant sunshine is like a wine that intoxicates him. So we find him always inquiring, investigating, questioning, inventing, working. His perceptions dominate his sentiments. Everything runs to form rather than to colour in his mind. He must have things definite and decided. The Englishman has more equipoise. His susceptibilities are more blunted; he is less nervous and more contented; calmer-minded; and steadier of purpose. He has his loyal sentiments, his fixed habits, his regular formulas of life and thought, his quiet prejudices, and in a word, his inertia of nature. He is fonder of facts than of metaphysics. He is full of general impressions, and does not like to be disturbed in them. His face and figure are vaguer in outline than the American's, and fuller of colour. He is fitter for a picture than for a bust."

On the question of solecisms in speech and "newspaper English" Mr. Story has several judicious remarks to make, which should endear him to Mr. John Morley. He will not allow things to "transpire" or to "be initiated," instead of merely "happening" or "beginning." He objects to "a fancy" being "indorsed," and makes the usual onslaught on that unfortunate word "reliable." He once, with a cold shudder down his back, heard a pretty American ask her child if she didn't "feel like beef-steak," and another exclaim, "What an elegant fish!" when seated with her husband at a table d'hôte. When Mallett observes that "you cannot expect a language not to grow and to change, unless it is a dead language," Belton replies:—

"I wish it to grow, but not to be corrupted and tampered with. No other people play such pranks with their language as we do. The French and Italians, for instance, jealously protect theirs from the invasions of ignorance and vulgarity, and study to keep them in their perfection, but we open our doors and let in tramps from anywhere. The literary class formerly was small and select. Nowadays everybody writes and prints. We mistake slipshod for ease, and the English language is losing its vigour and idiomatic form under the influence of daily scribbles. Foreign adventurers are freely admitted into the best company. Foreign idioms and slang are accepted and adopted to the exclusion of the staid graces of the old English tongue."

We should like to quote some of Mr. Story's anecdotes of Landor, but can only refer our readers to them. He enjoyed a personal acquaintance with the poet, and speaks of him with tender respect; while he pays a just tribute to Mr. Robert Browning, of whose kindness to the poor old man, after he had been turned by his wife and children out of his home at Fiesole, a touching account is given, which has a special interest at the present time.

If Mr. Story would consent to drop the amœbean framework of his book, and banish his musty scraps of antiquarian lore to what Clough described as their "lexicon-limbo," he might have material left for a dozen excellent essays. Belton and Mallett, who are, after all, mere clothes-pegs, would disappear, and all would run smoothly and satisfactorily. But so long as the 'Conversations' remain in their present shape, we are afraid they will repel rather than attract that most important personage, the general reader.

'In a Club Corner; or, the Monologue of a Man who might have been Sociable,' is much less weighted with learning, and consequently a good deal more readable, than Mr. Story's 'Conversations.' Its materials are slight enough, and strung together on threads so slender as often to be in danger of snapping; but an hour or two may be agreeably spent in turning over the three hundred and odd pages of which it is composed. Mr. Russell's obiter dicta are thrown out with no little aplomb, and one is tempted to wish that he had seen fit to give more of his own reflections and less of those of other people. Had he done so his book would have lost what is now its main defect, a certain snippiness of style and arrangement, which is too suggestive of paste and scissors. The range of subjects discussed is extensive: 'Garrick' rubs shoulders with 'Sheridan,' and 'The Faith Cure' is followed at a short interval by 'Digestion'; there are sensible papers on 'Public Speaking' and 'Reading Aloud,' and a pretty bundle of 'Paradoxes' comes next to some amusing 'Shakespeareana.' From the last mentioned we quote the following story as a sample of the smaller wares from Mr. Russell's pack:—

"When Bowdler mentioned his scheme of a purified Shakespeare to Dr. Harrington, 'No, No, Sir,' said the old gentleman, 'let us, when we have the woodcock, enjoy the little trail on the toast.'"

The book concludes with a rather remarkable list called 'Titles for Essays, with some Citations and Hints.' Whether these are intended by Mr. Russell for future use by himself, or are generously presented by him to his readers as a stimulus to composition on their part, is not very apparent. They remind us of nothing so much as of the notes jotted down for 'Typical Developments' by the compiler of that immortal work in Mr. Burnand's 'Happy Thoughts.' As thus, to give a few specimens at random:—

What to Do with the Kittens?
Keyholes—Tom Jones.
Milk and Praise—Mary Lamb.
Cork John—Nimble—Always atop.

The last of these may challenge comparison with the cryptic memorandum "Snails: and why?" which so sorely perplexed the brilliant littérateur alluded to above; and we recommend Mr. Russell to lose no time in committing his thoughts on this subject to paper, or he will certainly find that he has entirely forgotten what it means.

The Jew in English Fiction. By Rabbi David Philippson, D.D. (Cincinnati, Clarke & Co.)

THESE lectures of an American rabbi, agreeably written, if somewhat flowery, give an historical and critical account of the chief presentations of Jewish character in English fiction, dramatic and narrative, from Marlowe's 'Jew of Malta' to 'Daniel Deronda.' The purpose of the volume seems to be to lay down the legitimate limits of such presentation, and to indicate its falsehood, cruelty, and mischief when executed without due consideration of the facts of life and human nature. There is, no doubt, at present much bitter and ill-based prejudice against Jews, not perhaps in England, but in Russia, Austria, Germany, and also in France, and even in the United States—Dr. Philippson's own home—where the "rights of man" form part of the constitution of the land. It is not unnatural to inquire what part works of fiction have in exciting and fanning this prejudice; and it is most certainly just, even from a purely literary point of view—the only one that can here be taken—to censure plays or novels untrue to their function of holding up the mirror to nature, culling their materials carelessly and blindly, mistaking accidentals for essentials, or deliberately misusing imaginative gifts for the purpose of supplying a false justification for ancient rancours and enmities. Dr. Philippson apparently exaggerates the power of such works for harm. But whether this be considerable or not, he has, no doubt, the right of pointing out their faults and untruthfulness, and of deducing rules and cautions which all writers of fiction who would not be charged with unfaithfulness in the exercise of their craft and the employment of their talent must obey.

Dr. Philippson's complaints are twofold. He complains that a truthful picture may be defaced, and an artist's honesty come into suspicion, when a combination of traits, in itself real though unpleasing, is ascribed to a Jew without a shadow of necessity. The essential reality of a Fagin he does not deny; but why, he asks, should Fagin be described as a Jew any more than as a degraded Quaker, or Plymouth Brother, or Christadelphian? The cowl, we know, does not make the monk; and it is hard to see how a particular, and in fact elevated, form of religious belief should be requisite to the composition of a receiver of stolen goods. It is traditional again to ascribe usurious money-lending to Jews, and we all remember Sheridan's pleasure at hearing of the probable discovery of ten more tribes of the accommodating race, seeing that he had exhausted the indulgence of the other two. But money-lenders of the hardest kind have undoubtedly been found in other persuasions than the Jewish; and to confine ourselves here, as is becoming, to literary authorities, it is well known that by mediæval writers the Caursines were regularly described as the most un pitying kind of usurers, and that their wicked town of Cahors falls in Dante under the same curse as Sodom. Dr. Philippson's second complaint is that Jews have been invented in fiction simply to be clothed with impossible vices and to perpetrate unimaginable crimes. From this certainly Jews have not for a long time had to suffer in literature of a respectable kind. We shall not easily come across a repetition of the 'Jew of Malta' in modern English, and into the domain of maidservants' fiction we shall not intrude, nor do we suppose Dr. Philippson intends to do so. On that level, if we may trust report, many classes fare worse than the unhappy Jews; an earl or marquis is understood by the reader to be capable of any villainy, a solicitor of any roguery. In fiction of a higher order Jews are not necessarily either snobs or sharks. If writers who credit their Jewish creations with these characteristics were put to their examination they would probably contend that they have honestly found snobbery either more than usually common or more than usually vigorous among Jews. This, however, according to Dr. Philippson, gives them no justification for expressly describing their snobs as Jews.

He fully and candidly admits that where, and so far as, a special Jewish life exists, the painting of it, faithfully done, comes well within the province of the novelist, and has, in fact, furnished some novelists, chiefly German, with pictures at once vivid and human. Still materials for such pictures exist, Dr. Philippson contends, no longer; if used, they must be used in novels dealing with the surroundings of the past, and drawn from literary records or from memories of a generation now extinct. Taste and truth alike forbid us to label a bad character, or for that matter a good one either, as Jew or Christian, when he moves in the ordinary society of his level and country, and is in no way different from its average members. These principles seem to be unquestionable; the only question is whether Dr. Philippson has established the existence of data such as call for their immediate and universal application. Have the Jews no special society, no special life of their own? Are the Jews in England, say, no more than ordinary Englishmen with a superadded aversion for the three creeds? No doubt the great nations of modern times, the American most of all, exercise a strongly assimilative influence on all foreign elements that come within their borders; and the Jews, on the other hand, are singularly assimilable. The taste for learning poetry and music continental, if not British and American, Jews have always possessed; and in France and Germany they have grasped with equal energy the philosophy, science, fine arts, the social and political ideals, which it perhaps needed the initiative of Aryan races to open to them in the first place. "The Jew," says Dr. Philippson, "has stepped out of the Ghetto into the free light and air." If this is altogether true, we must admit that the basis for the special portraiture of Jews as Jews has pretty nearly vanished; and if we to some slight extent demur to it, we do so on the authority of Jews writing about Jews. It will hardly do in face of such a novel as 'Reuben Sachs' to insist that the Ghetto is altogether annihilated; its walls may have fallen, but the company within do not therefore disperse. In other words, even in this enlightened country, and at a high level of wealth and freedom, we find something real and definite that may be called "Jewish Society," with the exclusiveness, the narrowness, the preconceptions that are sure to mar any society. The Jews, Dr. Philippson most truly urges, must not be considered as a separate nation; they are not a nation, certainly; it would be ridiculous to call them a caste; but a "society," a "community" of their own, having to some extent special ideas, practices, tastes, and tendencies, they do appear to be. Dr. Philippson would absolutely separate a man's religious belief from his character. In a professed teacher of religion this seems somewhat strange doctrine. Anyhow it is one that we, not at all as teachers of religion, but merely as observers of life and literature, must protest against. Of the influence of beliefs we say nothing; but where there has long been a common life, strictly exclusive, from necessity or choice, of external elements, there must necessarily arise in such a milieu a community of sentiment and practice. To pass ethical judgment on this is not the province of the novelist or dramatist; but his very function is to do justice to the variety of our many-coloured existence. He deals with what is called "Society" and its pursuits and ideals, with the professions, with the artisan, and with loafing stragglers; he has never been denied the right of picturing the common life of the closely-knit society of Quakers, though their original basis was one of religious conviction only; still less can he be denied the right with regard to Jews, who, disintegrating as they seem to be, have still as the basis of common life a theological belief, a special history, and the pride of a pure and long-descended race.

D. M. Ausonii Mosella. Édition Critique et Traduction Française, précédées d'une Introduction, suivies d'un Commentaire Explicatif, par H. De La Ville de Mirmont. (Bordeaux, Gounouilhou.)

THIS elaborate edition of the 'Mosella,' published with all the honours of typography, and evincing great care and study on the part of its author, is an appropriate tribute from a modern scholar of Bordeaux to his celebrated countryman. The introduction, by far the largest and most important part of the volume, contains an account, partly independent and partly based upon older sources, of the manuscripts and editions of the poem. The text, though the new readings introduced by the editor are not always convincing, is framed on a careful estimate of the evidence, and with the aid of the most recent editions. The French translation is graceful and readable; the commentary, though it might well be fuller, is conscientiously put together and really serviceable. We should not omit to mention that a map of the Moselle is prefixed to the text, and that facsimiles of the title-pages of the older editions are given in the introduction.

Ausonius, though not a real poet, presents so many luminous points of contact with the interesting period in which he flourished (the middle and end of the fourth century A.D.) that he will always be read by students of life, of history, and of literature. He is a typical example of Latin culture in the south of France, the home of rhetoric. For Ausonius is, in point of style, no more than a brilliant and accomplished rhetorician, a master of metre, and unrivalled in the art of piecing together verses from shreds and patches of older poetry, from Lucretius, Virgil, Ovid, Lucan, and Statius. His most recent German editor, Peiper, has printed at the end of his volume a collection of the passages which Ausonius has imitated. The list is long, but long as it is, it could easily be enlarged by any scholar with a good memory.

There can be no doubt that M. de Mirmont has taken great pains with his work; indeed, that it has been a labour of love with him. Latin scholars and lovers of literature in general owe him a considerable debt of gratitude for it. He makes several new points in his introduction. The most important novelty is the account of Vinet's edition of 1551, which is so rare, apparently, as to have escaped the notice even of Boecking, whose report on the editions was, before the appearance of the present work, the fullest in existence. M. de Mirmont shows that in 1551 Vinet had introduced, either from his own conjecture or from older editions, several corrections which Schenkl and Peiper, the most recent German editors, attribute to the Lyons edition of 1558. Menecratis (v. 307), refluus (v. 463), and numine (v. 468) are due to Vinet himself. So far, so good; but we now come to a point on which we seriously differ from M. de Mirmont. Carried away, as it appears to us, by a violent anti-German prejudice, our editor makes a bitter attack upon Scaliger, whom he virtually charges with impudently appropriating without acknowledgment the results of Vinet's labours. We say anti-German deliberately, for M. de Mirmont seems to forget altogether that Scaliger was a Frenchman. The chief motive of his attack appears to be the fact that Scaliger is much admired in Germany; as though he were not admired in any other country. All scholars ought to be jealous for the honour of Scaliger. It is, therefore, worth while to ask what justification M. de Mirmont has for his accusations of dishonesty, impudence, and the rest.

It appears to us that, even on M. de Mirmont's own statement of the facts, his case falls to the ground. Between 1551 and 1575 two important editions of Ausonius appeared, the first in 1558, the second in 1568. In 1556 or 1557 Etienne Charpin, a priest of Lyons, discovered a new and important manuscript of Ausonius in the monastery of Ile-Barbe on the Saône. This manuscript came afterwards to Leyden, and is now known as the Vossianus III. It is still the best manuscript of Ausonius, but unfortunately does not contain the 'Mosella.' On an imperfect collation of this manuscript Charpin, with two colleagues, published the Lyons edition of 1558. Ten years later (1568) Poelmann published another edition for Plantin of Antwerp, with new manuscript material for the 'Mosella.'

Meanwhile Vinet was stimulated by reading the Lyons edition of 1558 to further curiosity about the Ile-Barbe manuscript. It was then at Bourges in the hands of Cujas, who sent it for Vinet, at the latter's request, to Bordeaux. Vinet must have used it, but by no means to such good purpose as he might have done, to judge by his edition published by Millanges in 1580. The manuscript was returned to Cujas, and in 1566 or 1567 Vinet sent a new text of Ausonius to the Lyonnese printer Antoine Gryphe, at the request of the latter. His commentary he kept back for the time. Through a common friend he obtained an introduction to Scaliger, who from the years 1570 to 1572 was at Valence, attending the lectures of Cujas. Scaliger promised to collate the Ile-Barbe manuscript again with Vinet's text, and further, in response to a request of Gryphe made in May, 1573, sent to the printer a number of his notes. In 1575 the edition appeared at Lyons under the name of Scaliger only, and with his notes—now called 'Lectiones Ausonianæ,' and dedicated to Vinet—printed at the end. Vinet, meanwhile, had himself, in February, 1575, sent another text of Ausonius, with his commentary, to Millanges of Lyons, who was, owing to adverse circumstances, unable to publish it till 1580.

From this it is surely obvious that Vinet had intended to put his first text—the text which Gryphe was to publish—into Scaliger's hands, and to bring out a text of his own published by Millanges. It never occurs, however, to M. de Mirmont, in his rage against Scaliger, to accept this simple solution of the matter. On the strength of Scaliger's work on the text of the 'Mosella,' and on this alone, our editor accuses him of pilfering Vinet's work without acknowledgment. Let us see how far, even on this narrow ground, the charge is made out.

One brilliant emendation, Vivisea for "vivifica" in the line (v. 438) "hæc ego vivifica duceus ab origine gentem," Scaliger seems undoubtedly to have got from Vinet in their correspondence, and to have proposed as his own in the 'Lectiones Ausonianæ.' But may not this have been a mere piece of forgetfulness? In any case, there are four or five other undisputed emendations by Scaliger on the text of the 'Mosella,' a poem of fewer than five hundred lines. Vinet never complains of Scaliger, or, indeed, speaks of him in any but the most friendly tone. But to urge this upon M. de Mirmont is useless. He refuses to see anything in Vinet's expressions but irony or Christian forbearance.

What, however, strikes us as the most remarkable point in M. de Mirmont's manner of dealing with the question is this, that he writes as though it were a matter merely of the 'Mosella,' and not of the whole of Ausonius. Was Scaliger's work on the text of Ausonius as a whole of sufficient importance to justify him in putting his name on the title-page of the edition, to the exclusion of Vinet's? We answer, unhesitatingly, in the affirmative.

The real importance of Scaliger's edition consists in the fact that he was the first scholar who really made a full and intelligent use of the Ile-Barbe manuscript. We have, by the greatest good luck in the world, stumbled upon a piece of evidence which, we think, places this fact beyond question. In the Bodleian Library is preserved a copy of Ausonius which belonged to Scaliger, containing his manuscript notes for the collation. The edition is Poelmann's of 1568, and we have ascertained by a careful examination that the manuscript notes in Scaliger's hand correspond exactly with those in the 'Lectiones Ausonianæ' in which he reports the readings of the MS. In the printed 'Lectiones' he calls the MS. vetus, sometimes priscus; in his manuscript notes he once writes v.c. (= vetus codex), but generally v. (= vetus). His text of Ausonius he bases largely upon this collation. It is only necessary to turn to Vinet's edition of 1575-80 to see that he and Scaliger are independent of each other. Vinet, it is clear, had only a very imperfect collation of the MS. before him; or, if he had more, he did not use his materials with much discernment. Scaliger's text is his own, and when one considers this, and the masterly character of the 'Lectiones Ausonianæ,' one can feel no doubt of his right to put his name on the title-page. Had the Ile-Barbe MS. included the 'Mosella,' the whole question would, in all probability, never have arisen.

We take leave of M. de Mirmont's book with a feeling of gratitude to him for the pains which he has taken in explaining and illustrating his author. We can only regret that he has allowed his unaccountable prejudice against Scaliger so far to get the better of him as to make him give an absurdly perverse account of the relations between that great scholar and Vinet.

Egyptian Sketches. By Jeremiah Lynch. (Arnold.)

OF the making of books on Egypt there seems to be no end, and this is doubtless the reason why Mr. Jeremiah Lynch has published the mature impressions of a few months' residence in Cairo and a trip up to Thebes. He has nothing whatever of novelty to describe, and old Egyptians will smile to read the same familiar common-places which have formed the stock-in-trade of so many travellers, from Stevens down to the author of the 'Nile Voyage.' At the same time it must be allowed that he is not unobservant, and that he has an amusing conversational trick of writing which prevents his little book being utterly tiresome. Much learning, however, is not his special failing: he knows about as little of Egyptian history and art as even an American can aspire to,—and one can hardly put the fact more strongly. His brief residence in the country was insufficient to give him any insight into the lives and minds of the people, and he is absurdly unfair in his judgments of the Mohammedan social and religious system. The plurality of wives, for instance, on which he is most severe, is quite unusual in Egypt, though it must be allowed that the divorce law requires almost as much revision there as in the United States. Mr. Lynch was delighted with the state reception given by the Khedive to Mr. Eugene Schuyler and himself; but is he right in saying that his Highness smokes? Nor must our author think that it was a special mark of respect for the United States that the Khedive received his visitors standing; it is his custom, and not unknown, we may add, in other Courts. Mr. Lynch has made other discoveries. He found the Ghawazees girls beautiful and respectable, and their dancing graceful, in which opinion he is singular. The Egyptians, he says, drink "only coffee," though they have been seen to imbibe more potent beverages. He has heard Arabs chanting "tales of Hafiz," who wrote Persian odes; and he has remodelled some details of history in an original manner. For example, he mentions that after the death of Harun-al-Rashid, "who lived at Baghdad, his son and successor moved to Cairo"—a fact hitherto unknown to the Arabic authorities; and we are also informed that on the death of Mohammed Ali a regency was formed to govern Egypt during the minority of Ismail. Abbas and Saïd Pashas are thus eliminated, and the hereditary principle is introduced into Egypt seventeen years before the firman of 1866. Of the ancient Egyptian monuments and beliefs there are some readable sketches, though it is not reassuring to be introduced, among "the present crop of Egyptologists," to "Piazzi Smith, who was the Egyptologist of the British Museum" (sic). But uninformed strangers are apt to be impressed with mysterious theories, just as most Australians are fervent believers in the "Great Cryptogram." Mr. Lynch considers the 'Book of the Dead' a curious affair, but our faith in his critical powers is weakened when he defines Herodotus—we trust in jest—as "an old humbug."

Premising that these Egyptian sketches can sustain no claims to originality or profundity, we are glad to be able to add that they are sensible, brightly written, and occasionally entertaining. Mr. Lynch is a warm admirer of the rule of the English in Egypt. "They went to work," he says, "in a thorough and energetic manner to cleanse the Augean stables. They stopped the system of farming out the revenues, and established a uniform tax on the land, based on a just and proper estimate of its value. They dismissed a number of useless and expensive officers, and abolished several obsolete sinecures. They curtailed extravagance wherever it was found, and practised as well as preached economy in the Government departments. Perhaps the greatest advantage accruing to Egypt from the English occupation is the care and scientific knowledge that have been devoted to the canal system and reservoirs. Though there have been 'bad Niles' no less than twice since the British came here seven years ago, yet the crops have been fairly good by reason of their wise administration."

This is at least fair. To Mr. Lynch's credit also be it said that, unlike many of his countrymen, he is reverent. He abhors the recent vandalism at Beni Hasan, and the hotel at the Pyramids. Speaking of America, he says:—

"We have as a nation no Past to make us pause and reflect. This is why we revere what we have not; and we would cherish and protect those relics of antiquity on the banks of old serpent Nile that time has not yet effaced. Egypt is to us an anodyne and the very paradise of a hashish dreamer."

In this spirit he has given his impressions, and if they teach us nothing they show a tone unlike that of the common tourist, and one which we should like to see more general. It should be added that there are some excellent illustrations of the Theban kings, taken from the mummies in the Cairo Museum, now removed to the doubtful stability of a Gizeh palace.

The Origin of the Aryans: an Account of the Prehistoric Ethnology and Civilization of Europe. By Isaac Taylor. (Scott.)

IT is now nearly forty years since Dr. R. G. Latham propounded what was then the startling thesis that the original home of the Aryan-speaking people was not in Asia, but in Europe. For a long period the speculation was seldom referred to except in terms of ridicule. In Germany it was derided as a characteristically English eccentricity; in England, although Dr. Latham's reputation as a philologist stood high, he was regarded, not without reason, as somewhat crotchety, and whatever weight might have been allowed to his opinion in a case where authorities were divided, few persons thought it worth attention when opposed to the unanimous judgment of the leaders in linguistic science. The adhesion of Benfey in 1868 secured for the European theory more respectful mention, but scarcely more acceptance, and it was not until within the last decade that it made any recognizable advance in the favour of scholars. Dr. Latham, however, lived long enough to have amends made to him for the contemptuous treatment which his paradox had received. It cannot, indeed, be said that the hypothesis of the European origin of the Aryans has taken its place among the established verities of science; but it is well-nigh universally acknowledged that the imposing body of evidence that once seemed to point to Asia as the primitive Aryan home has almost wholly melted away. It is further generally admitted that the philological arguments in favour of the European origin of the Aryans, as set forth with admirable scientific caution in Schrader's 'Sprachvergleichung und Urgeschichte,' are of great cumulative weight, and have not hitherto been adequately met; and several of the greatest authorities on physical anthropology have welcomed the new doctrine as that which best accords with the conclusions of their own science. With few exceptions, the scholars whose judgment is of value either give a more or less provisional assent to the new theory, or maintain that the question is not yet ripe for solution. It may safely be said that if the older doctrine is ever re-established, it will have to be based on new grounds, and to undergo a transformation which will essentially alter its historical significance.

Canon Taylor's brilliant little work is in part a summary of the reasoning by which Schrader and others have endeavoured to establish the theory of the European origin of the Aryans, and to ascertain the degree of culture attained before the close of the period of Aryan unity. The book was apparently written before the appearance of the new and largely remodelled edition of Schrader's great work. If the author had been acquainted with the German scholar's latest exposition of his views, he would no doubt have been able to correct or strengthen several of the arguments adduced. On the whole, however, it would scarcely be possible for the case in favour of the modern theories to be presented in small compass with greater lucidity and more effectively than in these pages. At the same time it should be remembered (though some of Canon Taylor's critics have forgotten it) that an argument which is essentially cumulative cannot fairly be judged by such an outline as can be given in a popular handbook.

Canon Taylor, however, has by no means confined himself to popularizing the ideas of others. While accepting Schrader's conclusions in their fullest extent, he has made them the basis of an investigation, to a great extent original in method, of a question which Schrader has not attempted to discuss, and to which Penka, De Mortillet, and other writers have given conflicting answers, that are rather of the nature of arbitrarily chosen hypotheses than of reasoned conclusions. The problem to which the author has addressed himself is that of determining which of the many races that speak Aryan languages is the one in which the Aryan form of speech may be presumed to have originated. This statement of the problem involves the assumption that Aryan speech was originally the property of a single race, or of a portion of a single race. The assumption is not absolutely unchallengeable, because it is conceivable that the germ from which the Aryan "hollethnic" language was developed may have been a sort of lingua franca formed in a mixed community that at first spoke two or more tongues radically distinct. Of this possibility Canon Taylor takes no account; but the value of his inquiry does not necessarily depend altogether on the correctness of the hypothesis that the primitive Aryans were of homogeneous race. It is, at all events, certain that all the races that in historical times have spoken Aryan languages are not descended from the primeval Aryan community; and even though the problem of identifying the "true Aryan race" should prove to be essentially insoluble, it is possible that Canon Taylor's attempts to solve it may render good service in showing, on the one hand, that certain individual Aryan-speaking races are non-Aryan in blood, and, on the other hand, in establishing the claim of one particular race to be regarded as having co-operated in the formation of the Aryan language.

Whether the particular conclusion at which Canon Taylor has arrived be correct or no, there is no doubt that his method of investigation is in principle strictly scientific. Those who are able to accept his premises—that is to say, his view of the classification of European races—will scarcely find it possible to dispute the cogency of the reasoning which he has founded upon them. The leading authorities on physical anthropology, however, are still so far from unanimous on many important questions, and the data for forming a judgment are still so far from complete, that several years may elapse before the ethnological system so lucidly expounded by the author can be either definitely proved or disproved. Combining the results of prehistoric research with those of investigations into the physical characteristics of existing peoples, Canon Taylor enumerates four distinct Aryan-speaking races which he considers to have existed in Europe, unchanged except by mutual admixture, from neolithic times. These are (1) the short, dark dolichocephali, presumably of African origin, and found only in the south and west of Europe, called by him the Iberian race; (2) the tall, fair dolichocephali, represented by the Swedes and North Germans; (3) the short, dark brachycephali, akin to the Lapps, and represented by the Auvergnats and the French Basques—the "Ligurian" race; (4) the tall, fair brachycephali, whose physical type is that ascribed by ancient writers to the Belgic Gauls, and who form a large proportion of the population of the Celtic-speaking portions of the British Isles, and also of that of the Slavo-Lettic-speaking countries. In discussing the respective claims of these four races to be identified with the primitive Aryan stock, Canon Taylor sets aside the Iberians, partly on the ground of their geographical position, and partly on that of the probability that their native language was of the Hamitic class. The Ligurian race is similarly pronounced non-Aryan for the reason that its language was presumably akin to Basque. The remaining alternative coincides verbally with that recognized by Penka, viz., that the Aryans must have belonged either to the "Teutonic" or the "Celts-Slavic" race; but while with Penka the latter term denotes a short, dark brachycephalic people, Canon Taylor's "Celts-Slaves," while equally brachycephalic, were tall and fair. As is well known, Penka identifies the Aryan race with the ancestors of the dolichocephalic Teutons. Canon Taylor decides in favour of his Celts-Slaves. His main arguments are, first, that the prehistoric Teutons are shown by archaeology to have been in a far lower stage of culture than that occupied by the prehistoric Celts-Slaves, and are, therefore, not likely to have imposed their language upon the latter; and, secondly, that the primitive Aryan sounds and inflections have, on the whole, been best preserved among nations belonging to the brachycephalic type.

The physical characteristics assigned by Canon Taylor to the Celts-Slavic race are found outside the Aryan region among the Ugrian peoples; and the author discovers in this fact an argument for his well-known hypothesis that the original Aryan tongue was developed out of some language of the Ural-Altaic class. The resemblances he cites between Aryan and Finnish roots and inflections are interesting; but a great deal more evidence is required before this speculation can be regarded as having an adequate scientific basis. Some of the comparisons rest on theories no longer generally admitted with regard to the prehistoric forms of the Aryan personal endings. It is a priori very likely that the Aryan verbal inflections are of agglutinative origin; but the tendency of recent research has been to invalidate the supposed evidence in favour of this conclusion. Canon Taylor mentions the Sanskrit periphrastic future, dātāmi, as an example of an Aryan agglutinative formation parallel to those of the Ural-Altaic tongues. It certainly is agglutinative, and so is the French aimerai; these forms, however, are not primitive Aryan, but late developments in individual Aryan languages; and if any one chose to contend that they are due to non-Aryan influence, it would be difficult to prove the contrary. At the same time, we do not think that the hypothesis of a primitive affinity between Aryan and Ugrian is, in the present state of knowledge, intrinsically inadmissible, and it has enough of plausibility to deserve exhaustive investigation.

Whether Canon Taylor's solution of the Aryan problem is the true one we do not attempt to decide; but it certainly appears to us to be better reasoned, more self-consistent, and based on a more comprehensive study of the various lines of evidence than any rival theory at present in the field. An hypothesis of which this can truly be said cannot fail to contribute to the progress of science, even though subsequent discovery should prove it to be untenable. That the book is singularly attractive in style no reader of the author's previous writings will need to be assured.

NOVELS OF THE WEEK.

- A Woman of the World.* By F. Mabel Robinson. 3 vols. (Smith, Elder & Co.)
Dishonoured. By Theo. Gift. 3 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)
Fairfax of Fuyton. By Mrs. Hibbert Ware. 3 vols. (White & Co.)
Mr. Bryant's Mistake. By Katharine Wylde. 3 vols. (Bentley & Son.)
The Sanctity of Confession. By Stephen Coleridge. (Kegan Paul & Co.)
The Master of the Magicians. By E. S. Phelps and H. D. Ward. (Heinemann.)
Dead and Buried. By M. H. Pickersgill-Cunliffe. (Gilbert & Rivington.)
For so Little. By Helen Davis. (Sonnen-schein & Co.)
Le Roman d'un Enfant. Par Pierre Loti. (Paris, Calmann Lévy.)
La Comtesse de Sartènes. Par Ch. Corbin. (Same publisher.)

The title of 'A Woman of the World' is rather misleading unless we take the story to be an illustration of the process by which a young and innocent girl is gradually robbed of her freshness and simplicity, and awakened from the poetic dreams of youth to face the prosaic realities of a loveless marriage. But we doubt whether the heroine, Eugenia Canning, would have ever become what is generally called a woman of the world. In the delineation of this character the author has shown not only artistic skill and delicate feeling, but also singularly true and keen insight into those complex workings by which a nature rich in possibilities, and not without a certain individuality of its own, is yet moulded by circumstances and surroundings into a form quite foreign to its original character. Indeed, it would be difficult to praise too highly some of the author's work. She writes with real power and truth; neither her pathos nor her sentiment is overstrained; though she is less successful with her men than with her women, her characters are natural and worthy of the study she has bestowed upon them; and on rare occasions there are touches of genuine humour. Yet taken as a whole the novel is disappointing. The most elaborate character, that of Will Harrington, the Methodist medical student and very perfect gentleman, is overdrawn. His marriage and sacrifice of himself is almost too improbable for reality, and artistically is a blunder. The protracted description of his death by consumption is too painful. The reader would gladly have been spared the ghastly realism of the struggle for life which is forced upon Harrington by his unhappy mother, who vainly strives to wrest him from the clutches of death itself. There is no denying the truth and force of these closing scenes, but there are griefs that are too sacred to be laid bare in such merciless detail, and sufferings which when seen too closely become almost repulsive. It is hard to find fault with an author who writes so well and so powerfully, but we fancy that most of her readers will wish that the third volume of 'A Woman of the World' had not followed the other two.

The subject of 'Dishonoured'—the mental agony suffered by a peculiarly noble-minded girl on discovering the secret that there is a stain upon her birth—is in itself fruitful of pathos, and if the writer showed as much power in developing a story as in imagining individual scenes and in sketching characters Theo. Gift's charming book might have secured a more than ephemeral success. The portrait of the heroine is both winsome and vivid, and there are some scenes—especially the one where she is compelled to listen to the pleadings of Mrs. Rice on behalf of her love-stricken son—which blend pathos with humour so ably that they might pass for the work of a more ambitious novelist than we take Theo. Gift to be. The descriptions of Stoneham—the highly self-respecting Stonehamites—and especially of the good Nonconformist folk who attend the chapel to admire, in an intensely critical spirit, the Rev. John Rice's sermons, would have been more remarkable than they are had they preceded and not followed Mrs. Oliphant's marvellous descriptions of the Nonconformist world in 'Salem Chapel.' Mrs. Rice and Sarah Rice are admirable sketches, but on the whole the best portions of the story—and here we see Theo. Gift's infirmity as a constructor—are not given until after the proper peripeteia has been reached. These are the scenes in the third volume, where the reader is introduced to new characters, a new dramatic action, and new scenery in Northumberland. Old Mr. Benison, the father of the heroine, who underneath his ruggedness of manner hides a nature so loving that his life is wasted in the forlorn hope of the return of the wife who has betrayed him, is sketched in a few pages with that easy strength which only an entire sympathy with the character depicted can lend to any writer. It, indeed, lifts the story into literature. The Northumberland scenery, too, is rendered with the surety of a perfect knowledge:—

"Swell beyond swell, ridge over ridge, it swept away north, east, and west as far as the eye could reach in a vast undulating sea of rich brown, of tawny red, and vivid purple, massing itself together and rising higher until it seemed to blend imperceptibly into low ranges of hills of a deeper amber colour with, behind these, higher ranges, purple shadowed in brown or vivid ultramarine blue; and beyond all this again, rising above the furthest blue, and outlined in transparent colour against the ether into which they seemed to melt, a line of mountain peaks all palely pink and gold, and bathed in the rose and amber of the early morning sunlight which flowed like a benediction over these silent moors, and kindled the autumn tints to transient glory. Before such a sight even Olive needed not the sea."

The style, though on the whole good, as the above extract will show, is not without blemishes. One of the worst is perhaps the frequent use of an ellipsis of a peculiarly irritating kind—a kind which seems to be passing from the penny-a-liners to writers who ought to know better. To write, as Theo. Gift does, "Once this was crossed," instead of saying "When once this was crossed," is not to write English, but vulgar jargon; and yet we saw the other day, even in the Quarterly Review, in an exceptionally able article upon heredity, a turn of phrase exactly on this model: "Once the period of reproduction is finally over," for "When once," &c. Like most novelists, Theo. Gift is shaky when she begins to quote poetry. Coleridge never wrote

As idle as a painted toy
Upon a painted ocean.

The book is dedicated to the memory of Robert Browning.

In 'Fairfax of Fuyston' Mrs. Hibbert Ware has made use of the curious tract of Edward Fairfax, the translator of Tasso, as the groundwork upon which to found her novel; and with the help of other works upon the same subject and contemporary documents bearing upon the social life of the time she has contrived to give a fairly interesting account of a certain credulous side of our ancestors' character, which, perhaps, even to-day has not altogether disappeared from among ourselves. The story is well conceived and well told. Indeed, it succeeds better as a romantic tale than as an illustration of an historical time. The author writes with considerable simplicity and directness; her characters are natural and well drawn; though they may not be particularly characteristic of the time, they are true enough to human nature in general; and her descriptions of English scenery under its wilder aspects are excellent. Where the book chiefly fails as an historical romance is in the want of what might be called "timecolour." The speech of the various characters is only fitfully archaic in form, and after a "Marry!" or a "Good sooth!" or two they generally lapse into fairly modern English. Moreover, the author has a provoking habit of suddenly dragging in the present day for the sake of comparison, and of describing the old towns like a modern guide-book. But it would be an ungrateful task to look for perfection in a work which shows the signs of much painstaking labour, and which, after all, amply justifies its publication as a decidedly readable and interesting story.

The author of 'Mr. Bryant's Mistake' has a bent for philosophical exposition, and she occasionally gives her readers a little too much of it in a didactic form. But to say that her characters and the results of their actions are traced out step by step in the incidents and the plot of her story, and that they teach in this way an interesting lesson on philosophical lines, is only to give Katharine Wyld the praise which her skilful workmanship unquestionably deserves. Mr. Bryant is a clergyman who marries a young widow of uncertain antecedents—a young widow more delicate in mind than in manner and speech; and, what was still more embarrassing, a young widow with a baby. This was his first mistake, and his second was a good deal more serious. He put the child away, changed its name, and stored up endless trouble for everybody. The baby grows up to be a heroine of fiction, and sheds brightness and gaiety over 'Mr. Bryant's Mistake.' The merits of this story, in spite of a few improbabilities, are indisputable.

'The Sanctity of Confession' is rather thin and poor in texture, and it leaves the reader a little aloof and "away," as it were. But it is short, and easy enough to read. By means of an episode occurring in Spain the evil of enforced secrecy in the matter of confession is exposed. It is the reverse of the picture that has been more often shown in fiction. It seems to us that the thing might have been turned to better account, and been given with a more romantic and dramatic dash about it—certainly with more vitality. Mr. Coleridge has not so ordered it. But if he has not succeeded in imparting many positive qualities, he has at least refrained from claptrap tricks to draw his readers.

Daniel as a prophet is a familiar figure to most people; but Daniel as a man, and a young man, capable of an entirely human and unrequited passion, is a new study. Though in 'The Master of the Magicians' the den of lions is not reached and no mention is made of the three children in the fiery furnace, the court of Babylon under Nebuchadnezzar has provided ample material for a thrilling story. There is an admirable description of a lion hunt, and other incidents worthy of Mr. Rider Haggard; but the human interest grows with the story, and it is with regret that the reader takes leave of Daniel with so many familiar, but unrelated adventures still ahead of him. The Hebrew prince and prophet is here represented in his youth as full of personal attractions, of great courage and physical dexterity. The purity of his life and the stoicism of his concealed love, only heightened by the pathetically human touch of the last scene, are sufficient reminders that it is the man of God who walks alone and upright through the dissolute court of Babylon. The hypnotic trances of the young prophet are not particularly well done, and give an impression of unreality alien to him who exposed the falseness of Bel. The king's madness and the death of Amytis are the most dramatic scenes in the book, while the captain of the guard and his schoolboy brother are the most attractively drawn characters. It is a pity that the somewhat grandiose and flowery language, indispensable apparently in treating of the Babylonian empire, should occasionally lapse into something other than Queen's English. The joint authors deserve, however, credit for careful and detailed description of the court and its customs.

'Dead and Buried' leaves nothing like an impression on the mind, unless it be that here is a well-meant little story which could not harm the most innocent home in England in spite of its rather sensational title. The episode it describes took place, it would seem, in Christchurch, Hants, in the year 1641. The author has tried to put herself into the place and time in a praiseworthy manner—and who shall say she has not succeeded?—and yet there is little or no interest about the story. Be this as it may, there are doubtless people who will feel well disposed towards the little volume; and it would be cruel to blame them.

'For so Little' has some of the qualities one looks for in the "shocker"; but the greatest of these is brevity, and that it has not got. In spite, however, of sundry longuenre and languors it is not unexciting. Mr. Lawrence Maber is a poisoner—not a poisoner, perhaps, of the first water, so to speak, but still a poisoner—fascinating, complex, individual; on the whole, an entertaining kind of being. Some parts of his conduct and career, and his deportment generally, are inexplicable; but then we know that mystery and unsatisfactoriness add to the spell of a story of the sort. This one is anything but a triumph of literary skill; the interest is of another kind, and consists in incident and play of emotion. There is also a sort of naïveté and simplicity that is not unattractive, and a curious combination of the high-flown and familiar which would shock a purist, but to another class of mind may seem a pleasing incongruity. Enough has been said to show that the thing is sufficiently crude, and yet that it has a something which helps one to the end, even while feeling it is long in coming, and not a particularly good end when it does come.

"Lotti" has succeeded, where many have failed, in relating the daily life-history of his childhood in such wise as to make it interesting.

In M. Corbin's book, which reaches us at the same time, three noble men and two noble ladies, with five broken hearts among them, do things which are for the most part those they should do, and furnish forth a story which will please persons who like tearful novels.

LAW BOOKS.

The People's Dictionary of English Law. By A. Wood Renton, M.A., LL.B. (Hodder & Stoughton.)—This is a book of fewer than three hundred pages, and, as the author does not limit himself to mere definitions, it is obvious that he must limit himself very much in another way, namely, as to the number of words or subjects dealt with. The book shows more signs of work than some others of its class, but it is unequal, and cannot safely be relied upon. At p. 88 the author tells us that if a man die intestate, having had two children, B and C, who have died in his lifetime, leaving, respectively, three sons and two daughters, these five grandchildren are treated, for the purpose of distribution, as children of the intestate. In other words, the assertion is that the five grandchildren will take one-fifth each; but this is entirely wrong, for, according to the decision In re Ross's Trusts, L.R., 13 Eq. 286, the three children of B will take one-sixth each, and the two children of C one-fourth each. The case here referred to was decided eighteen years ago, so that there is no excuse for the author's not being acquainted with it. On the same page the rights of brothers and sisters and their children are very imperfectly explained. No reader could possibly gather that the mother takes equally with brothers and sisters, if any, or that nephews and nieces who have survived their own parents take equally if mother, brothers, and sisters are all dead, but take their respective parents' shares in other cases. When will writers of law books learn the elementary rule that, if they really wish to make the law clear to the public, they must begin by understanding it themselves? We give Mr. Renton due credit for not having fallen into a common error of small-law-book writers, namely, that of stating that a will must not be altered after execution. The law on the subject is given at p. 275 without that mistake; but Mr. Renton mentions only one way of effecting alterations, whereas the Wills Act provides two. Mr. Renton states correctly that wills of soldiers and seamen (under certain circumstances) may be made orally; but he omits two most important points—the first, that this privilege is surrounded by so many petty difficulties as to be practically of little use; the second, that the soldier or seaman may make a written will without the usual formalities as to execution and witnesses. Mr. Renton has apparently taken a good deal of pains about some of the more difficult articles; but, examining that on "Insanity" as an example, we find it too deep for the general public, yet scarcely deep enough for the lawyer; the article on "Lunacy" is of a more practically useful character; but the two together occupy seventeen and a half pages, obviously more than their due in so small a book. Notwithstanding many shortcomings there are seeds of good in 'The People's Dictionary,' and a second edition of somewhat larger size might be really useful, if prepared with a firm resolution to expunge errors, to complete truncated statements, and to strike out what is either too abstruse or too minute for popular use. In the proposed second edition the reference to "Testaments" in the article on "Wills" may as well be omitted, seeing that on turning to "Testaments" we find nothing but a cross-reference bidding us return to the place whence we came.

A Handbook to the Death Duties. By Sydney Buxton, M.P., and George Stapylton Barnes. (Murray.)—As there are novels, so there are law books, with a purpose, and this is one with a purpose clearly and sharply defined. The little book, consisting of 109 pp. "all told," contains the information required in an ordinary way by persons who have to pay what are now frequently called "death duties"—that is to say, that the reader will easily find out, with the help of an excellent index, how much he will have to pay by way of probate duty, legacy duty, &c., in any particular case; it does not pretend to deal with the thousand and one doubtful points which have exercised the courts, and which are collected in the much larger work of the late Mr. Hanson. We may remark, by the way, that in an elementary treatise the fact ought perhaps to be brought out rather more prominently that "probate duty" and "legacy duty" are popular and rather misleading designations, the former kind of duty being, in fact, payable on letters of administration equally with probate, the latter on property devolving by intestacy equally with bequeathed property. But the main object of the book is to show how much the country loses by the enormous indulgence with which real property and settled personal property are treated, and this could scarcely be brought out more lucidly than it is. For brevity we shall confine our own remarks to the former. Apart from the entire exemption of real property from probate duty, the succession duty, which comes as it were in the place of the legacy duty which would be payable on ordinary personal property, is paid on an estimate of the value during the successor's life, and not on the capital value, as in the case of legacy duty. To show the working of these distinctions the authors give a simple and startling illustration. A man aged ninety-five inherits from his brother a landed estate worth 10,000*l.* and also a sum of 10,000*l.* in money. On the former he has to pay only 5*l.* 7*s.* succession duty, while on the latter he must pay 300*l.* probate duty and 300*l.* legacy duty. Even this does not sum up the whole case, for the 5*l.* 7*s.* is payable by instalments spread over four years, and if he dies when some only have become payable the rest need not be paid at all! An extreme instance, as the authors justly observe, is useless for purposes of general comparison, but it is useful as showing in a striking manner the direction in which legislation should move if it is desired that the death duties should become more valuable to our budget-making ministers. The suggestions for reform in the book before us may be described in a few words. Probate duty should be extended to all kinds of property; a duty of uniform character should be substituted for legacy and succession duties; and all property should pay on its true capital value. We cannot quite agree with the authors in considering the Succession Duty Act a "model of good draftsmanship"; the pages of Hanson bear witness to the extent to which its complicated provisions have exercised the ingenuity of rival advocates. Moreover, the Inland Revenue authorities insist, when there is a concurrence of legacy and succession duties, on taking the higher of the two, whichever it may be. They could scarcely venture to make such a claim in the teeth of the section which enacts that when there is legacy duty there shall be no succession duty (not, be it observed, that when the two concur there shall be any choice between them), did not they, at least, conceive that there is some ambiguity in this Act "without equal," which has "never required any amendment"! The authors should reconsider their opinion on this particular point. They have produced, undoubtedly, a valuable little work; but the portion of it which is useful to the practitioner might have been placed in a much smaller compass if unmixed with the historical and didactic matter addressed to the fiscal reformer.

We have before us the Statutes of Practical Utility for the session 52 & 53 Victoria—in other words, for the year 1889 (Sweet & Maxwell). We have already, in dealing with other works, had occasion to allude to 'Chitty's Statutes,' of which the thin volume above mentioned is an annual continuation. The huge work which bears the name of a deceased Chitty, but is now edited by Mr. J. M. Lely, barrister-at-law, is too costly to admit of frequent new editions, and the continuation, prepared each year by Mr. Lely, is a most welcome addition to the larger work. The saving of trouble and the practical assistance in ascertaining the law afforded by this great compilation and its yearly offshoots are indisputable, and are thoroughly appreciated by those who use them in actual practice.

A Supplement to the Anglo-Indian Codes, 1887, 1888. By Whitley Stokes, D.C.L. (Oxford, Clarendon Press.)—Our readers may remember that, in reviewing Dr. Stokes's 'Anglo-Indian Codes,' we likened that work to the well-known 'Chitty's Statutes.' A fresh point of resemblance arises from the publication of a little supplement containing one or two Acts passed in 1888-9, and so bringing the work up to date. We presume that similar additions (which should be eminently conducive to the practical usefulness of the work) will be made from year to year.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

Two books about the colonies reach us at the same time, the one concerned with British North America and British South Africa, and the other with Australia; but they are of very different degrees of merit. The former is a History of the Dominion of Canada, by the Rev. William Greswell, who in describing Canadian confederation has largely brought into use his great knowledge of the Cape. The volume is published under the auspices of the Royal Colonial Institute and by the Clarendon Press, and it is the first of a series which are intended to illustrate the progress of the three great groups of colonies of North America, South Africa, and Australasia. It is mainly intended for the public schools, and has been supervised by the members of the Educational Committee of the Colonial Institute, a well-composed body, the Canadian members of which have had something to do with the present work. While Sir Henry Barkly and Sir Charles Mills may be trusted to supervise the African volume, Mr. Washington Eves will be a little thrown away on the committee if the West Indies are not included; and the committee as at present composed is hardly strong enough in Australian members to deal adequately with the history of Australasia. Mr. Greswell's history of Canada is excellent, and is illustrated by good maps. The appendix is full of interesting things, but is not very well arranged. No one would, for example, look for an account of the Canadian canal system under the head "Navigation of the Mackenzie River." Both Dr. Bourinot and Mr. Todd are mentioned, but there is not sufficient acknowledgment of the admirable character of their constitutional works. Mr. Munro's book does not appear in the list of authorities, which should certainly contain the books of Todd and Bourinot.

THE other volume of which we spoke is The Golden South: Memories of Australian Home Life from 1843 to 1888, by "Lyth," published by Messrs. Ward & Downey, and not of any great value, although it may interest inhabitants of New South Wales.

THE following booksellers have sent us their catalogues: Mr. Blackledge, Messrs. Dulau (astronomy), Mr. Galwey (fairly good), Mr. Glaisher, Mr. Higham, Mr. W. Hutt (early editions of Mr. Swinburne, Mrs. Browning, &c.), Messrs. Jarvis & Son (good), Mr. Reader (occult sciences), Mr. F. Scott, Mr. Spencer (Americana), Messrs. Sothran (capital catalogue, including a collection of books on political economy), Messrs. Suckling & Galloway, and Mr. Wheldon (zoological works). Messrs. Meehan of Bath (bibliography of Bath and Somerset), Mr. Hitchman and Mr. Thistlewood of Birmingham, Messrs. Matthews & Brooke of Bradford, Messrs. Lupton Brothers of Burnley (illustrated books), Mr. Rooney of Dublin, Mr. Johnston of Edinburgh, Mr. Simmons of Leamington, Mr. Miles of Leeds, Mr. Howell and Messrs. Young & Son (good) of Liverpool, Mr. Maddocks of Manchester, Messrs. Attwood of Plymouth, and Mr. White of Workop have also forwarded their catalogues.

WE have on our table A Short Abstract of the History and Science of the English Language, by A. B. Brockwell (Simpkin).—First Work in English, by A. F. Murison, edited for Indian Students by J. Adam (Madras, Srinivasa Varada Chari & Co.).—College Echoes, by D. Cuthbertson (Houlston).—Graphic Sketches of the West, by H. B. Kent (Chicago, Donnelley & Sons).—Elementary Principles of Ornament, by J. Ward (Chapman & Hall).—The Anglo-American Annual, a Directory and Handbook for Residents in Paris, 1890 (Brentano).—The Oberammergau Passion Play, 1890, by Mrs. A. Tweedie (Kegan Paul & Co.).—The Healing Art and the Claims of Vivisection, by E. Berdoe (Sonnenschein).—Evolution, Antiquity of Man, Bacteria, &c., by W. Durham, F.R.S.E. (Edinburgh, Black).—The Biology of Daily Life, by J. H. N. Nevill, M.A. (Kegan Paul & Co.).—The Gentle Art of making Enemies, edited by Sheridan Ford (New York, Stokes).—The Function of Labour in the Production of Wealth, by A. Philip (Blackwood).—Dramatic Opinions, by Mrs. Kendal (Murray).—The Truth about 'The Dead Heart', by J. Coleman (Drane).—Tom's Wife, by Lady Margaret Majendie (White & Co.).—An Early Frost and An Awkward Affair, by C. T. C. James (Ward & Downey).—The Forest of Andarida, a Legend of West Sussex, by C. Stopford (Vickers-Wood).—Cæsar's Column, by E. Boisgilbert, M.D. (Chicago, Schulte & Co.).—Prose and Poetry, by Herr Cherrytree (New York, Alden).—Cause, by M. Doyle (Kegan Paul & Co.).—The Christian Ministry, by W. Lefroy, D.D. (Hodder & Stoughton).—The Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges: Malachi, with Notes and Introduction by the Ven. T. T. Perowne, B.D. (Cambridge, University Press).—Das Bürgerliche Recht und die Besitzlosen Volksklassen, by Dr. A. Menger (Tübingen, Laupp).—Mon Journal (Hachette).—and Aspasie, Cléopâtre, Théodora, by H. Houssaye (Paris, Lévy). Among New Editions we have Roscoe and Schorlemmer's Treatise on Chemistry: Vol. III.,

Organic Chemistry, Part II. (Macmillan).—Robert Browning, by W. G. Kingsland (Jarvis).—The Kings of Carrick, by W. Robertson (Hamilton, Adams & Co.).—Riel's Culturgeschichtliche Novellen, translated by S. Mendel and J. Gibson (Cornish & Sons).—Classified and Annotated List of Books for the Use of Head Teachers and Pupil Teachers (Simpkin).—Four-Figure Mathematical Tables, by J. T. Bottomley, M.A. (Macmillan).—Practical Plane and Solid Geometry, including Graphic Arithmetic, Vol. I., by Prof. H. J. Spooner, C.E. (Cassell).—and Choice Cookery, by H. M. Young (Heywood). Also the following Pamphlets: The Best Route to Ober-Ammergau and Description of the Passion Play, by H. W. Domville (Kegan Paul & Co.).—Centenary of the French Revolution, translated from the 'Revue Occidentale' by J. H. Bridges (Reeves & Turner).—The Book of King Arthur, by E. R. Russell (Liverpool, Marples).—The Rights of Property, by the Hon. Auberon Herbert (Liberty and Property Defence League).—Honest Journalism, the History of a Gold-Mining Swindle, by "Scrutineer" (30, Fleet Street).—A Handbook to the Report of the Special Commission (Arnold).—The Secret of an Easy Shave, by J. Arnold ('Sanitary Engineering' Office).—and The Baptized on Behalf of the Dead—Who? by R. A. Macfie (Nisbet).

LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

ENGLISH.

Theology.

Appeal (An) to Unitarians, by a Convert to Unitarianism, 3/6.
Brewster's (E.) Collect, Epistle, and Gospel, Teachings for the Sundays of the Christian Year, 12mo. 2/6 cl.
Christian Bible Readings (The): Genesis, Exodus, &c., 2/6.
Dalton (H.) On Religious Liberty in Russia, roy. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Hughes (Rev. H.) Principles of Natural and Supernatural Morals, Vol. 1, 8vo. 12/6 cl.
Innes's (A. T.) Church and State, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl. (Handbook for Bible Classes.)
Moinet's (Rev. C.) The Great Alternative, and other Sermons, cr. 8vo. 6/6 cl.
Nunnery Life in the Church of England, edited with Preface by Rev. W. L. Holland, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Rawlinson's (G.) Isaac and Jacob, their Lives and Times, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl. (Men of the Bible.)
Spiers's (Rev. W.) The Sabbath for Man, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.

Poetry and the Drama.

Bain's (F. W.) Dmitri, a Tragi-Comedy, cr. 8vo. 6/6 cl.
Bulkeley's (Rev. H. J.) Alysip, and other Poems, 12mo. 2/6.
Fleay's (F. G.) Chronicle History of the London Stage, 1559-1642, 8vo. 18/ half-rox.
North's (L. H.) The Wrong of Death, a Realistic Poem, 2/6.
Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet, with Coloured Illustrations, folio, 25/6 cl.

History and Biography.

Bax's (E. B.) Story of the French Revolution, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Child's (G. W.) Church and State under the Tudors, 8vo. 15/6.
Duff's (A.) Memorials of, by his Son, W. P. Duff, cr. 8vo. 2/6.
Gosse's (E.) Robert Browning's Personals, 12mo. 4/6 cl.
Lives of English Authors, a Biographical History of English Literature, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Reid (Mayne), a Memoir of his Life, by Elizabeth Reid, his Widow, cr. 8vo. 6/6 cl.

Geography and Travel.

Baillie's (A. F.) Kurachee, Past, Present, and Future, 21/6 cl.
Moffatt's New Geography, edited by T. Page and revised by E. Hammonds, cr. 8vo. 4/6 cl.

Philology.

Livy, Book 1, and Horace's Odes, Books 1 and 2, interlinearly translated by J. Gibson, 8vo. 2/6 swd.

Science.

Garrod's (A.) Treatise on Rheumatism and Rheumatoid Arthritis, 8vo. 21/6 cl.
Mercier's (C.) Sanity and Insanity, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.

General Literature.

Bigg's (A. H.) Schoolboy Truth and Honour, a Story for Boys, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Cross's (M. B.) Thyme and Rue, 2 vols. cr. 8vo. 21/6 cl.
Davidson's (J.) Perfidy, the Career of Ninian Jamieson, 6/6.
Dickens's David Copperfield, Crown Edition, cr. 8vo. 5/6 cl.
Doyle (C.) and others' Strange Secrets, cr. 8vo. 2/6 bds.
Dufferin and Ava (Marquis of), Speeches delivered in India, 1884-8, 8vo. 9/6 cl.
Fearn's (M.) Called to be Conquerors, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Gray's (A.) The King's Diadem, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Green's (E. E.) Mischievous Moncton, or Jest turned to Earnest, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Kenyon's (E. C.) Monica's Story, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Lysaght's (E. J.) Thorns and Roses, a Story of Home Life, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Mulholland's (R.) The Haunted Organist of Hurly Burly, and other Stories, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Norris's (W. E.) The Baffled Conspirators, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Shadwell's (Mrs. L.) Not his own Master, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Towers's (E.) Land of Sunshine and Gold, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Watson's (J.) Nature and Woodcraft, cr. 8vo. 5/6 cl.

FOREIGN.

Theology.

Achelis (E. C.) Praktische Theologie, Vol. 1, 2m.
Analecta Hymnica Medii Ævi, hrsg. v. G. M. Dreyes, 7m. 50.
Atzberger (L.) Die Christliche Eschatologie, 5m.

Lindenbein (A.): Erklärung der Offenbarung des Johannes, 2m. 50.

Löw (L.): Gesammelte Schriften, Vol. 2, 5m.

Schultz (H.): Grundriss der Evangelischen Dogmatik, 1m. 60.

Zahn (A.): Das Deuteronomium, 1m. 60.

Fine Art and Archaeology.

Baumeister (A.): Bilderhefte aus dem Griechischen u. Römischen Altertum, Parts 4-6, 3m. 75.

Berleux (J.): La Caricature Politique en France, 1870-72, 25fr.

Gerspach (M.): Les Tapisseries Coptes, 8fr.

Perret (F.): Fontainebleau, 20fr.

Poetry and the Drama.

Bernard (J.): Quelques Poésies de Robespierre, 1fr.

Wetz (W.): Shakespeare vom Standpunkte der Vergleichenden Litteraturgeschichte, 7m. 20.

Philosophy.

Barth (P.): Die Geschichtsphilosophie Hegel's u. der Hegelianer, 3m.

History.

Welschinger (H.): Le Roman de Dumouriez, 3fr. 50.

Geography and Travel.

Chabot (A.): Promenade en Hollande, 3fr. 50.

Kiepert (H.): Spezialkarte vom Westlichen Kleinasien, 10m.

Bibliography.

Dziatzko (K.): Gutenberg's Fröhste Druckerpraxis, 9m.

Philology.

(Euvres de Gautier d'Arras, publiées par E. Loseth, Vol. 2, 9fr.

Science.

Neumann (L.): Atlas der Hautkrankheiten, Part 12, 10m.

Pax (F.): Allgemeine Morphologie der Pflanzen, 9m.

BEATRICE.

DANTE, sole standing on the heavenward height,
Beheld and heard one saying, "Behold me well:
I am, I am Beatrice." Heaven and hell
Kept silence, and the illimitable light
Of all the stars was darkness in his sight
Whose eyes beheld her eyes again, and fell Shame-stricken. Since her soul took flight to dwell
In heaven, six hundred years have taken flight,
And now that heavenliest part of earth whereon Shines yet their shadow as once their presence shone
To her bears witness for his sake, as he
For hers bare witness when her face was gone:
No slave, no hospice now for grief—but free
From shore to mountain and from Alp to sea.
ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE.

AN EARLY AMERICAN EDITION OF ELIA.

THERE has lately come into my possession, through the generous kindness of Mr. C. B. Foote, of Pine Street, New York, a "Second Series" of the 'Essays of Elia,' compiled and published at Philadelphia in 1828—that is to say, five years before Lamb collected his 'Last Essays of Elia' in 1833. The volume is for many reasons interesting, and is probably very rare, as Mr. Foote tells me that he has inquired among the leading second-hand dealers of New York, and that not one of them had ever heard of this edition. The copy which Mr. Foote has so kindly given me came from the Brevoort Library.

The First Series of Elia was published in England, as all lovers of Charles Lamb well know, in 1823. This was reprinted in Philadelphia in 1828 without variation, and the success of the volume presumably suggested to the publishers to compile a second, uniform in shape, from the essays of Lamb that had appeared since that date in the London Magazine. The compiler had no difficulty in finding material, and about a dozen of those which Lamb afterwards included in his 'Last Essays of Elia' are accordingly found in the volume. But the collection was made carelessly, and probably in great haste, for the editor overlooked three such characteristic essays as 'The Wedding,' 'The Superannuated Man,' and 'The Convalescent.' Moreover, he seems to have confined his researches to the London Magazine, and thus did not light upon those other papers from the New Monthly Magazine and elsewhere which appeared in the English edition of 1833. On the other hand, he had to make up a volume of fair size to rank with the reprint of the First Series, and he set about this in strange fashion. In flat defiance of his own statement on the title-page that the contents of the volume had appeared in the London Magazine under the signature of Elia, he included several early essays of Lamb's, such as those 'On the Melancholy of Tailors' and 'The Danger of confounding Moral with Personal Deformity,' which were collected by Lamb in the two-volume edition of his works in 1818; and finally he obtained the required amount of copy by culling from the pages of the London Magazine three papers of the authorship of which Lamb was wholly guiltless.

The first of these is a pleasantly written essay, 'The Nuns and Ale of Caverswell'—unsigned in the London, but which I have discovered to be by Allan Cunningham; and two others, 'Valentine's Day' and 'Twelfth Night'; or, What You Will, signed "Ω," were in fact written by B. W. Procter. It may be interesting to lovers of Elia, and of old editions, to possess a copy of the entire table of contents:—

Contents.

To Elia (sonnet by Bernard Barton, beginning "Delightful Author").

Rejoicings upon the New Year's Coming of Age.

Reflections in the Pillory.

Twelfth Night; or, What You Will.

The old Margate Hoy.

A Vision of Horns.

On the Danger of confounding Moral with Personal Deformity.

On the Melancholy of Tailors.

The Nuns and Ale of Caverswell.

Valentine's Day.

On the Inconveniences resulting from being Hanged.

Letter to an Old Gentleman whose Education has been Neglected.

Old China.

On Burial Societies, and the Character of an Undertaker.

Barbara S—.

Guy Faux.

Poor Relations.

The Child Angel.

Amicus Redivivus.

Blakesmoor in H—shire.

Detached Thoughts on Books and Reading.

Captain Jackson.

Confessions of a Drunkard.

The Old Actors.

The Gentle Giantsess.

A Character of the late Elia.

The choice by the editor of Allan Cunningham's pretty and sentimental account of meeting a nun of Caverswell, as from Elia's hand, was by no means creditable to his sagacity. The two papers by Procter, on the other hand, are written in obvious imitation of the Elia manner, and form a salutary warning to imitators, as showing how wholly beyond their reach is the vital spirit of their original. All the little trickeries of Lamb's style (when not at its best) have been caught; but the "spirit, the spirit, Master Shallow!"

I should be glad to hear if this edition has been recorded and described before.

ALFRED AINGER.

MR. WILLIAM WHITE.

MR. WILLIAM WHITE died at his house at Cheshunt on the 29th of May, in his fifty-ninth year. He was favourably known for his critical biography of Swedenborg, published in two volumes in 1867, and republished in a condensed form (one volume) the year after. In his later years he devoted his pen almost entirely to the service of the opponents of vaccination, having edited since 1879 a monthly journal called the Vaccination Inquirer, and written the greater part of it. In 1885 the result of his inquiry into the early circumstances and antecedents of Dr. Jenner's famous discovery appeared in a considerable volume, most elaborately indexed, the title of which—"The Story of a Great Delusion"—sufficiently indicates the author's point of view. Mr. White's varied sympathies brought him into relation with a large circle, among whom his writings were valued not merely for their matter, but also for the terseness and soundness of the style.

LORD LOVAT.

FROM the extract given by Col. Fergusson in his edition of 'Major Fraser's Manuscript' there can be little doubt as to 1683 being the year of Lovat's graduation. Probably also he did, not long afterwards, accept a commission in the regiment of Lord Murray, but his excuse is plainly a lie. This should have been more clearly intimated by me, but the fact that the date 1683 was inserted after the article was in proof is probably the cause of the ambiguity. The year 1667 is, at all events, the most probable birth-date. As to the island of Aigas, Mr. Groome is, no doubt, well entitled to write as an authority on the subject of Scottish geography, but I am not aware that there is an island of Aigas in the Hebrides; nor do I know of any geographical law requiring that every Scottish island should be assumed to be in the Hebrides unless it is stated to be elsewhere. The island near Castle Downie is well known, and the context leaves room for no dubiety.

I really cannot discern anything very bad in the statement that "Emilia assumed the title of Baroness of Lovat," even supposing she were not of age, for no doubt in such a case her guardians would make her assume it. They could not assume it themselves, and if it was to be assumed she was the only person who could do so. In a technical sense, therefore, the phrase seems in the circumstances admissible. The marriage contract of 1685 is, of course, not in itself any evidence as to date of birth, unless it be shown not to be post nuptial. Such contracts are very common, and genealogists who refused to recognize their possibility would make sad havoc in family pedigrees. A statement of Major Fraser would, however, if accepted, prove that the girl was under age, but on this point I express no opinion.

I must decline to consider Mr. Groome's difficulty as to Mar writing a letter from Scotland in February. That he did so is not even improbable. If Mr. Groome knows that the letter was written in some other month, good and well; but mere surmises do not demand consideration.

T. F. HENDERSON.

THE ORIENTAL CONGRESS.

THE following invitation to Orientalists and friends of Oriental studies has been issued by the Organizing Committee for the ninth International Congress of Orientalists:—

DEAR SIR,—We have the honour to invite you to take part in the ninth International Congress of Orientalists, to be held in London from the 1st to the 10th of September, 1891, on the basis of the statutes and of the original principles laid down at the first meeting of the Congress in Paris in 1873, which was succeeded by the following meetings: London, 1874; St. Petersburg, 1876; Florence, 1878; Berlin, 1881; Leyden, 1883; Vienna, 1886; and Stockholm-Christiania, 1889.

The ninth meeting will be held under the honorary presidency of Sir Henry C. Rawlinson, the presidency of Sir M. E. Grant Duff, and the vice-presidency of Sir George Birdwood, assisted by a committee, the names of the members of which will be found overleaf.

You are aware that the place of the ninth Congress not having been designated at the last Congress, the right of doing so reverted to the Paris founders, who exercised it by formally transmitting their powers to the London Committee, on behalf of which we have the honour of sending you the present invitation.

In the event of your being desirous of becoming a member of the above Congress, we shall be obliged by your kindly signifying that wish to any of the secretaries, accompanied by your full name, designation, and address, and a subscription of 1*l*. You will receive in return a card of membership, which will entitle you to any publication regarding the organization of the Congress or the subjects for research or discussion that will be issued in connexion therewith before, during, and after it is held.

THE HOSPITALERS IN ENGLAND.

A CERTAIN charitable society which obtained a charter of incorporation in 1888 as "The Grand Priory of the Order of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem in England" has been circulating a very remarkable pamphlet. The title of the pamphlet is this: "The English, or Sixth, Language of the Order of the Hospital of Saint John of Jerusalem: a brief Sketch of its History and Present Position, compiled by a Committee appointed for that purpose by the Chapter of the Language."

The Order of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem, it should be remembered, was divided for administrative purposes into Nations or Languages; of which Provence, Auvergne, France, and England were respectively the first, second, third, and sixth. The Grand Priors of the Order in England and in Ireland were subdivisions of the Nation or Language of England.

Speaking of the fate of the knights of the Order at the time of the Reformation, the pamphlet says, p. 21:—

"A general sequestration of their property in England took place. The statute which struck this heavy blow at the prosperity of the Order was dated as the 32nd Henry VIII. cap. 24 (1540). The accession of Mary to the throne of England revived the hopes of the Language, and its restoration was speedily decreed. By a Royal Charter of Philip and Mary, dated 2nd April, 1557, the then existing knights of St. John in England were created a corporation under the title of 'The Prior and Brethren of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem in England' with perpetual succession: Sir Thomas Tresham was nominated Grand Prior, and a portion of the property of the Language was restored. This revival was, however, but short lived. The death of Mary disappointed the rising hopes of the Language, and one of the earliest acts of her successor, viz., the statute 1 Elizabeth, c. 24, annexed to the Crown all the property of the Order in England. This statute did not, however, enact the dissolution of the corporate body, as has been sometimes stated, but dealt simply with its property."

The facts are these. The Act 32 Henry VIII. cap. 24, dissolved the corporation of the Order in England and Ireland, and granted the lands and goods of the Order in those countries to the Crown. The Act 4 & 5 Philip and Mary, cap. 1, empowered the king and queen to make grants of Crown lands by letters patent. By letters patent* dated April 2nd, 1557, the king and queen incorporated the members of the Grand Priory of the Order in England, and granted them certain Crown lands in England formerly belonging to the Order. The Act 1 Elizabeth, cap. 24, granted the lands held by all religious bodies in England to the Crown. The lands granted to the Grand Priory were thus recovered for the Crown within a year of their alienation. The purported incorporation was probably bad from the beginning; for it would have amounted to a partial repeal of the Act 32 Henry VIII. cap. 24, and Acts of Parliament are not repealable by charters from the Crown. All these proceedings were necessarily inoperative abroad; and the Nation or Language of England remained a division of the Order as before, with the Grand Priors of England and Ireland as subdivisions.

In its list of the Grand Priors of England the pamphlet mentions, p. 37:—

"Thomas Tresham: appointed Grand Prior of England by a Royal Charter of Mary, Queen of England, dated Greenwich, 2nd April, 1557."

No man could be appointed to a dignity in an independent sovereign order by a charter from the English Crown. As a matter of fact, the letters patent of April 2nd, 1557, merely contain a recital that Cardinal Pole, the Papal Legate, in the exercise of powers delegated to him for that purpose, had appointed Sir Thomas Tresham to the Grand Priory and various other Englishmen to various other dignities appertaining to the Language of England. It is only by thus garbling these letters patent that a precedent can be created for the charter of incorporation of 1888, in which the Queen purported to appoint the

* These letters patent are partly printed by Dugdale, 'Monasticon,' vol. vi. p. 811, ed. 1830, with a note that the portion omitted consists wholly of particulars of the lands granted. On consulting the original at the Record Office, Patent Rolls, 4 & 5 Philip and Mary, xiv. 1-32, it will be seen that the note is accurate.

Prince of Wales to the Grand Priory and various other Englishmen to various other dignities appertaining to the Language of England in the Order.

After noticing the misfortunes of the three French Languages of the Order (i.e., Provence, Auvergne, and France) during the French Revolution, the pamphlet proceeds, p. 27 :—

"The fall of Napoleon and the restoration of the Bourbons in 1814 removed the ban under which the French knights had lain since the edict of the 19th September, 1792. They at once reassembled in a chapter-general at Paris, and forming, as they did at that time, the most powerful branch of the Order still surviving, elected a permanent capitular commission, in which was vested plenary power to act as might seem best for the general interests of the fraternity. The formation of this capitular commission was confirmed by a pontifical bull issued by Pope Pius VII. on the 10th August, 1814, and recognized by the Lieutenant of the Mastery and the Sacred Council in an instrument dated the 9th October following."

The French knights did not reassemble in a chapter-general; they did not elect a capitular commission, or any commission in perpetuity; they did not invest any commission with power to act as might seem best for the general interests of the fraternity; nor did they even purport to do any of these things. By letter of August 2nd, 1814, the Grand Prior of Aquitaine reported to the Council of the Order—the office of Grand Master being vacant—that the three French Languages had appointed a commission at Paris, consisting of himself as president with six members and a secretary, to further the interests of those three Languages in France :—"Elles (les Langues Françaises) ont donc nommé, dans leur sein, une commission destinée à poursuivre, en France, leurs intérêts généraux." This letter came before the Council on October 1st, and was answered by the Lieutenant of the Mastery on October 9th, 1814. The Lieutenant did not recognize the commission as such, but said that, as a matter of convenience, he would gladly correspond with the Grand Prior and his colleagues about the affairs of the Order in France. The formation of the commission was not confirmed by any pontifical bull or brief. The document of August 10th, 1814, is a letter from the Pope to the Grand Prior, without any reference whatever to the commission. I have before me official copies of all these documents.

The pamphlet then proceeds, p. 27 :—

"This commission exercised important acts on behalf of the Order in general during a series of years; it negotiated, though unsuccessfully, with the king for the restoration of the property of the Order in France; it treated, in 1814, with the Congress of Vienna for a new chef-lieu in the Mediterranean. In an appeal to the French king and chambers it represented the whole Order in 1816, and again at the Congress of Verona in 1822. Also, as recorded by Sutherland, 'in 1823, when the Greek cause began to wear a prosperous aspect, the same chapter, encouraged by the good will which the Bourbon family was understood to entertain for the Order, entered into a treaty with the Greeks for the cession of Sapienza and Cabressa, two islets on the western shore of the Morea, as a preliminary step to the reconquest of Rhodes, to facilitate which arrangement an endeavour was made to raise a loan of 640,000*l.* in England."

At the Congress of Vienna in 1814 the Order was represented by plenipotentiaries appointed by the Council of the Order. It was suggested in the letter of August 2nd, 1814, that each Language of the Order should send a representative to Vienna to assist the plenipotentiaries; but this suggestion was rejected in the letter of October 9th, 1814. The secretary of the commission transmitted unofficially to the Congress a note upon the history of the Order; but this note did not even mention the existence of the commission.* The Order does not appear to have been represented at all at the Congress of Verona in 1822.

The commission certainly petitioned the French chambers in 1816 for the restoration of the property of the Order in France; but it did not even claim to represent the whole Order. The commissioners presented their petition in three capacities : * firstly, as a portion (comme faisant partie) of an Order having possessions in France; secondly, as representatives of the Languages of Provence, Auvergne, and France, which owned property in France; and thirdly, as knights of the Order, and therefore individually entitled to a hearing.

The statement by Sutherland occurs in Constable's Miscellany, vol. lxiv. p. 327, and is quite unauthoritative. I have before me an original prospectus of the loan; and this shows that the loan was offered in the name of the Order itself, without any allusion to the existence of the commission. As a matter of fact, however, this loan was started by certain members of the commission, without the knowledge or consent of the Council of the Order. Consequently, by circular letter of March 27th, 1824, the Lieutenant of the Mastery peremptorily forbade the members of the commission to hold any further meetings as a commission or otherwise. I have before me an official copy of this letter.

The pamphlet then proceeds, p. 28 :—

"While engaged in these various negotiations for the benefit of the Order at large, the question was mooted of a possible revival of the English Language, and the matter speedily received a practical solution. The commission placed itself in communication with the Rev. Sir Robert Peat, D.D., and other Englishmen of position, to whom were submitted the documents constituting the commission. These gentlemen undertook to give their aid in the resuscitation of so interesting a relic of the ancient chivalry of Europe. The negotiations, which were continued for some months, resulted in the revival of the English Language of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, for which purpose articles of convention were executed on the 11th June, 1826, and on the 24th August and 15th October, 1827. The Chevalier Philippe de Chastelain and Mr. Donald Currie were appointed delegates for formally inaugurating the revival, by deed dated 14th December, 1827. On the 24th January, 1831, the Chevalier de Chastelain attended a meeting in London when the English Language was formally reorganized, and the Rev. Sir Robert Peat was invested with the functions and authority of Grand Prior of the revived English Language."

A revival of the Language of England was impossible, for the Language of England was still extant in the Order. But in any case the proceedings were invalid throughout. The commission was only empowered by the French knights to act in France in matters affecting the three French Languages; and in fact the French knights could not delegate to the commission any larger powers than they themselves possessed. Consequently the commission had no power to act in England or in matters affecting the Language of England. Strictly the commission had no power to act at all, since its formation had not been authorized by the Council of the Order; and the qualified recognition accorded by the letter of October 9th, 1814, had been cancelled by the letter of March 27th, 1824, two years before the beginning of these proceedings. The argument that the commission was acting on behalf of the whole Order can only be maintained upon the theory that A is necessarily acting on behalf of B because A has tried to borrow money in B's name.

Suddenly abandoning the argument that the commission was acting on behalf of the whole Order, the pamphlet says, p. 28 :—

"The articles of convention distinctly recite that in making this revival the French Languages are acting with the concurrence and approval of those of Aragon and Castile, thus, by a representation of five out of the eight divisions of the Order, giving the weight of majority, if such addition were necessary, to the powers of the associated French Languages."

A recital of the concurrence of parties is worthless unless those parties testify that concurrence by joining in the deed; for otherwise there is no evidence that the recital is inserted with their knowledge or consent. It is not alleged that the Languages of Aragon and Castile joined in these articles of convention. At a meeting of the eight Languages of the Order five could certainly outvote three on any question that arose; but no such meeting was held at this time; and the question of the revival of the Language of England could not possibly arise, for that Language was extant, and would be present and voting as one of the eight.

Sir Robert Peat's appointment to the Grand Priory was utterly invalid. By the statutes of the Order, tit. 13, sec. 3, the right of appointment to all Priories was vested in the Grand Master and Council, so that he was not appointed by the proper authority; and by tit. 13, sec. 10, membership for fifteen years was required before appointment to a Priory, so that he was not even qualified for appointment.

The pamphlet then proceeds, p. 29 :—

"In 1834, acting under the advice of the Vice-Chancellor of England, Sir Launcelot Shadwell (who himself shortly after joined the Order), Sir Robert Peat sought to qualify for office, and at the same time to revive the charter of Philip and Mary, before referred to, by taking the oath de fidei administratione in the Court of King's Bench. He accordingly attended, on the 24th February, 1834, and the Court, as the records of the Language state :—'on its being announced by the Maecr that the Lord Prior of St. John had come into Court to qualify, rose to receive him, and he did then and there openly qualify himself before the Lord Chief Justice of England, Sir Thomas Denman, Knight, to hold, exercise and discharge the office of Prior of the Language of England under the Charter of King Philip and Queen Mary.' The oath of qualification taken by Sir Robert Peat in the Court of King's Bench is now a record of the kingdom, and a copy of the same, authenticated by the signature of the Lord Chief Justice, is in the archives of the Language."

The Act 9 George IV. cap. 17, which was then in force, requires that, as a qualification for office, the declaration therein mentioned shall be made and subscribed in the King's Bench or in certain other courts; and that "the court in which such declaration shall be so made and subscribed shall cause the same to be preserved among the records of the said court." As the King's Bench records for 1834 contain no declaration or oath by Sir Robert Peat, it appears that he did not qualify for office, as alleged.

The pamphlet continues, p. 30 :—

"The following is the copy :—'In the King's Bench. I the Right Reverend Sir Robert Peat Knight Vicar of New Brentford in the County of Middlesex and Prior of the Sixth Language of the Sovereign Order of St. John of Jerusalem in London do make oath and say that I will faithfully truly carefully and strictly perform fulfil keep and obey the ancient Statutes of the said Sovereign Order as far as they are applicable to the government of the Sixth Language and in accordance with the other seven Languages and that I will use the authority reposed in me and my best endeavours and exertions among the Brethren to keep the said Statutes inviolable, this deponent hereby qualifying himself to govern the said Sixth Language as Prior thereof under the provision of the Statute of the 4th and 5th of Philip and Mary in the case made and provided.'"

This oath seems a purposeless piece of swearing. By the constitution of the Order, the Languages were governed by Bailiffs, with Priors as their subordinates in each Priory : a Prior could not govern a Language, nor could there be a Prior of a Language. There is no statute of 4 & 5 Philip and Mary relating to the Order at all; and the letters patent of those years make no provision for the government either of the Language or of the Priory. Thus Sir Robert Peat merely bound himself to fill an impossible office under an imaginary statute.

This examination of the essential portions of the pamphlet shows that this charitable society has no valid claim to be recognized as part of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, and further shows that the society has endeavoured to establish that claim by false and misleading statements.

CECIL TORR.

P.S.—In a correspondence in these columns last January one of the members of this charitable society referred me to this pamphlet for

* This note is printed by Klüber, 'Acten des Wiener Congresses,' vol. v. pp. 490 ff. Cf. vol. vi. p. 466.

* See 'Archives Parlementaires,' Series 2, vol. xvii. p. 622.

information, and told me to apply to their secretary for a copy. I applied accordingly, and got no answer. It was by chance that I saw a copy some while afterwards. Still I ought to tender my thanks to that anonymous correspondent for referring me to such an instructive source of information.

SALES.

THE continuation of the sale of the library of the late Sir Edward Sullivan, Lord Chancellor of Ireland, at the rooms of Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge, was well attended, and the prices were adequately sustained. Among the more eagerly contested articles were: Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy, first edition, 23s. 10s. Chronicon Nurembergense, 28s. Ainsworth's Jack Sheppard, first edition, 12s. 16s. Cruikshank's Comic Almanac, 37s., and his edition of Robinson Crusoe, 9s. Dibdin's Northern Tour, 20s. 10s. Doran's Annals of the English Stage, 21s. Dugdale's Monasticon, 33s. Fabian's Chronicle, 23s. 10s. Musée Français et Musée Royal, 60s. First edition of Goldsmith's Deserted Village, 7s. Gould's Himalaya Birds, 23s., and his Birds of Great Britain, 60s. Haden's Etchings, 31s. Hakluyt's Voyages, first edition, 36s. 10s.; and second, 15s. Heures à l'Usage de Rome, three editions on vellum, 61s. Holinshed's Chronicles, the Shakespeare edition, 56s.; and his second, 8s. 15s. Homerus Græce, first edition, 160s. Horæ, printed by Kerver on vellum, 46s. Keats's Endymion and Lamia, first editions, 10s. 1s. La Fontaine, Fables, first edition, 21s. Lodge's Portraits, 40s. Molière, Œuvres, 1682 edition, 13s.; 1824 edition, 25s. 10s. Monstrelet, Chroniques, printed by Verard, 21s. 10s. The sales of the first thirteen days amounted to 7,002l. 19s. 6d. The last day's sale (twenty-first) of this extensive library is Friday, June 13th.

Messrs. Christie, Manson & Woods sold on May 21st and 22nd the library of the late Mr. Wells. The following books were notable: Bewick's Birds, 30s. Claude's Liber Veritatis, 1777-1819, 30s. Gould's Birds from the Himalayas, 29s. Stirling-Maxwell's Artists of Spain, proof impressions and Talbotype illustrations, 65s. Houghton Gallery, 34s. Raffaele, Loggie nel Vaticano, 51s.

DR. SCHMITZ.

By the death of Dr. Leonhard Schmitz we have lost one of the last surviving pupils of Niebuhr. Born in 1807, he received his education at the Gymnasium of Aix-la-Chapelle and at the university the Prussian Government had established in Bonn after the acquisition of the Rhine province. Here he came under the influence of the three great scholars Niebuhr, Welcker, and Brandis, who more, perhaps, than any of their contemporaries helped to revolutionize the study of history. In 1837 his marriage with an English lady brought him to this country, and he was speedily welcomed by the distinguished group of Cambridge men who, dissatisfied with the entire devotion to textual criticism of the school of Porson, were endeavouring to introduce the historical method into classical learning. The translation of Niebuhr's history, which Hare and Thirlwall had begun, was the first symptom of the new era. This translation was completed by Dr. Schmitz in conjunction with Dr. W. Smith. A still more important enterprise was the publication of the full notes he had made of some of Niebuhr's 'Lectures on Ancient History,' and he thus stirred up the Germans to pay a fitting tribute to the great Dane. He also, with the support of Cornwall Lewis and other friends whom his talents had secured, started the Classical Museum and carried it on successfully for several years—no small feat in a country where periodicals devoted to learning meet with scant encouragement. He further translated Zumpt's Latin Grammar, and thus contributed to the revival of Latin scholarship in England, where for many years it had been neglected owing to the exclusive devotion of the Porsonians to Greek. These as well as his later writings showed a command of English quite wonderful in a foreigner.

In 1846 he became Rector of the High School of Edinburgh, and although much occupied by the duties of his office, his literary activity continued unabated. He brought out a school 'History of Greece' based on Thirlwall's great work, and a 'History of Rome' on a similar scale, a manual of 'Ancient History,' and also one of 'Ancient Geography' and one of 'Medieval History.' He had already been a contributor to the 'Penny Cyclopædia,' edited by George Long, and to the 'Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities' started by Dr. W. Smith, and he was one of the chief writers in the dictionaries of Biography and Geography edited by the same scholar. He also superintended for Messrs. Chambers an excellent series of classical school-books. In 1859 he gave a course of historical instruction to the Prince of Wales, and a few years later to the Duke of Edinburgh; but in 1866 he quitted Edinburgh to become head of the International College at Isleworth. This post he resigned in 1874. For the next ten years he was Classical Examiner to the London University, and he continued to labour, undeterred by advancing years, till incapacitated by a severe accident at the beginning of 1889. From this he rallied wonderfully, and seemed likely to regain his usual health till the beginning of the winter, when he was attacked by severe influenza, and, although nursed with the tenderest care, gradually grew weaker till the 28th ult., when he quietly breathed his last.

Though highly successful as a head master and the teacher of many men afterwards distinguished, Dr. Schmitz's main service to his contemporaries was to act the part of an interpreter between English scholarship and German; to set before Englishmen the great advances that Germany had made, since Wolff at Halle gave her the impulse, towards attaining a clear comprehension of the ancient world. The effects of this awakening to the importance of the historical method are to be traced not only in our school-books, but in works of erudition, and not merely in classical scholarship, but in many other branches of learning.

As a man Dr. Schmitz was a German of the good old kind, such as prevailed in the universities of the Fatherland before the era of blood and iron: intensely industrious, personally unambitious, and almost devoid of the art of 'getting on'; content to labour for scant reward, and never apparently expecting more. His was an extremely affectionate, lovable nature. Devoted to his family and his home, simple in his habits, and diligent in the performance of duty, he was a model of that type of scholar to whom knowledge is its own exceeding great reward.

Literary Gossip.

THE manuscripts of Wilkie Collins's novels and tales are to be sold by Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge on Wednesday week—'Basil,' 'The Woman in White,' 'No Name,' 'Armada,' 'The Moonstone,' &c.—and along with them the unpublished MS. of 'The Frozen Deep,' which contains a number of corrections and additions and remarks in Dickens's handwriting, among them the list of the actors; and also the prompt book, most of which is in Dickens's handwriting.

MR. LESLIE STEPHEN has gone on a brief visit to the United States, but he has positively declined to lecture. He hopes to return very soon. He will contribute the lives of Hume and Dr. Johnson to the coming volumes of the 'Dictionary of National Biography.'

A CORRESPONDENT sends us what is probably the latest news of Walt Whitman, who, writing from Camden, New Jersey, on the 22nd of May, says:—

"I am feeling pretty well at present, but have had a bad winter—have had the grip and a second attack—was out yesterday four or five miles, to the bay shore and linger'd some time by the water side—eat and sleep middling well—in good spirits.....shall probably get out this fine afternoon in wheel chair—have kind attention."

The veteran "poet of democracy" sends through our correspondent a characteristic message to those in this country who are interested in his welfare: "Love to you, and best wishes and remembrances to British friends."

NEXT Saturday there will be sold at Sotheby's some juvenile efforts of Mr. Browning's, accompanied by a letter from his father:—

"Bank, March 11th, 1843.

"He has not the slightest suspicion that any of his very juvenile performances are in existence. I have several of the originals by me. They are all extemporaneous productions, nor has any one a single alteration. There was one amongst them 'On Bonaparte' remarkably beautiful—and had I not seen it in his own handwriting I never would have believed it to have been the production of a child. It is destroyed."

IN the same sale will be included a copy of 'Bells and Pomegranates' which contains the first three proofs of 'Dramatic Lyrics.' In the first one the 'Pied Piper' does not occur, thus confirming the story that Browning "threw in" the 'Piper' to make up enough copy for the number. This first one has some interesting alterations by Browning, and one or two slight sketches on margin just to show the meaning of words the printer has not understood; it has also the full note to 'Artemis.' The second has the 'Pied Piper,' but it is wrongly inscribed to "Mr. C. the younger" (? printer's error for "M.C. the younger"). In this state the last sentence of the note to 'Artemis' is scratched out. A letter from R. Browning, senior, will be disposed of at the same time, in which he says: "The case is rather singular. Before I knew that Robert had begun his tale of the Rats, I had contemplated a story on the same subject." With this letter he sends his version, as far as he had then written.

THE forthcoming volume of the Pipe Roll Society's publications will contain the Roll for the 13th Henry II., which will afford a striking instance of the historical value of these records. In the chronicle of Battle Abbey there is a very circumstantial story of certain fines being exacted from tenants of the abbey (the manors and amounts being given) by Alan de Nevill in his Forest Iter, and of the abbot insisting on restitution when he heard of it, though the fines had already found their way into the Treasury. The case, says the chronicler, was heard at the Exchequer, and "auditis ex cartarum testimonio ecclesie libertatibus," the money was ordered to be restored. The Roll records the fines for the same places and amounts as the chronicler.

IN the course of the present month Messrs. Macmillan & Co. will issue the following new novels, viz.: 'A Cigarette-Maker's Romance,' by Mr. Marion Crawford, in 2 vols.; 'The Tragic Muse,' by Mr. Henry James, in 3 vols.; and 'A South Sea Lover,' in 1 vol., by Mr. Alfred St. Johnston, author of 'Camping among Cannibals.'

M. RENAN is recovering, we are glad to say, from his long and painful attack of gout.

A JAPANESE view of the Eastern Question will be expounded in a volume entitled 'Japan and the Pacific,' which Mr. Fisher Unwin will shortly publish. The author, Mr. Manjiro Inagaki, B.A. (Cantab.), is a native of Japan, and dedicates his work to Prof. Seeley. Commencing with a sketch of the commercial and political position of Japan, the history of the Eastern Question is traced from its genesis, long chapters telling of the Crimean and Russo-Turkish wars. In the last chapter, on Central Asia, Mr. Inagaki suggests a solution of his own.

MR. SAMUEL MULLEN, publisher and bookseller, late of Melbourne, died suddenly on the 29th of May, at the house of his son at Kilburn. Mr. Mullen commenced his career in the trade in Dublin with Messrs. McGlashan & Gill, whence he emigrated to Australia nearly forty years ago, and established himself at Melbourne, founding the business now carried on under the denomination of Melville, Mullen & Slade, for whom the deceased was the London agent, for which position he had recently settled in London. He was sixty-two years of age.

NEW cheaper and revised editions of several of Miss Betham-Edwards's novels are in preparation. 'The Parting of the Ways' will shortly be added to Mr. Bentley's six-shilling fiction. 'Disarmed' will form a volume of Messrs. Methuen's "Novel Series." New editions are also forthcoming of 'For One and the World' and 'Doctor Jacob.'

MADAME JAMES DARMESTER, who wrote in the last Quarterly on the French in Italy, will have an article in the Fortnightly for July on 'The Bookmen of Paris in the Fourteenth Century.' Madame Darmester is going to publish a volume of lyrics selected from her books. A German translation of them is preparing.

WE are sorry to say that, in consequence of Mr. David Balsillie's appointment as manager of the literary department in the firm of Messrs. A. & C. Black, it has been found necessary to suspend for a time the publication of the Social Pioneer and the Children's Guide. If circumstances permit, it is intended to resume these excellent magazines on the same general lines as they have followed since their start in January. The May number of the Social Pioneer is before us, and a thoroughly good number it is.

MR. W. POLLARD writes from Hertford:—"On Sunday, May 25th, died at Widford, Herts, Mr. Arthur Tween, aged seventy-five years. He married Miss Norris (named in Charles Lamb's 'Elia'), who survives him. He was buried on the 27th of May in Widford churchyard, within a few yards of the grave where rests Charles Lamb's aunt. The entry in the parish register is merely of the burial—'Mary Field, May 6th, 1792.' In the churchyard are also the gravestones of Mrs. Tween's mother and brother—Elizabeth Norris, relict of Randal Norris, Esq., of the Inner Temple, died July 2nd, 1843, age seventy-eight years," and 'Richard Norris, only son of Randal and Elizabeth Norris, died in 1836, age thirty-two years.' The inscription on Miss Field's gravestone is illegible, but might be restored. The old Blakesware mansion stood in the valley below the church, about three furlongs off. It was pulled down in 1823."

WE regret to hear of the death, at Brockley, at the age of seventy-four, of Mr. R. W. Smiles, brother of the venerable author of 'Self-Help.' The deceased was born at Haddington, and for a short period was a bookseller at Blackburn, afterwards becoming chief librarian at the Free Library in Manchester. This post he resigned about a quarter of a century ago.

THE mid-June issue of the Universal Review will contain a contribution from Count Tolstoi, which supplies, it is said, not only a reply to the criticisms made upon 'The Kreutzer Sonata,' but also a definite statement of Count Tolstoi's views on the subjects of morality, marriage, and Christianity.

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & Co. are about to publish a work by Mr. Clarmonth Daniell, entitled 'The Industrial Competition of Asia,' or the connexion between currency and the trade and finances of our empire in the East, with especial reference to current events, to the competition of India in European markets, and to increasing the supply of gold available for British commercial purposes.

MR. WILLIAM ANDREWS, of Hull, has in the press a volume to be shortly issued under the title of 'Obsolete Punishments,' dealing with the ducking-stool, branks, pillory, stocks, &c.

MESSRS. F. V. WHITE & Co. will publish immediately Fergus Hume's new novel 'The Man with a Secret,' and 'Crisis-Cross Lovers,' by the Hon. Mrs. H. W. Chetwynd. John Strange Winter's novel, 'Ferrers Court,' will be published shortly.

THE International Stenographic Congress, to be held at the beginning of next August at Munich, will be inaugurated by the unveiling of a Gabelsberger statue. We understand that the official language at the congress will be German, but that other languages will not be debarred from the discussion. Female stenographers will be admitted to the congress.

IN the exhibition of the works of Suabian authors, just held at Stuttgart in connexion with the congress of the Neu-Philologen, the "Schiller Abteilung" formed the principal point of attraction. It contained, among a number of original manuscripts of the poet, several reports on his progress during his stay at the Karls-schule, in one of which the Duke Karl Eugen remarked "that it would be well for the student Schiller to stay another year at the academy. In the mean time it will be possible to subdue his fiery temper; and if he continues to be industrious, he may yet become ein grosser Subjectum!"

A NUMBER of hitherto unpublished letters and treatises left by the philosopher Ludwig Feuerbach will shortly be issued under the editorship of Prof. Bolin, of Helsingfors.

ACCORDING to a long analysis in the Levant Herald the Bulgarian Minister of Education has produced the second quarterly number of the 'Collection of National Scientific and Literary Works.' It appears to be as copious and interesting as the first. It amounts to a publication at Government expense of all the literary and scientific essays and pamphlets, and is stimulating vigour in those departments.

THE death is announced of a highly prolific Portuguese novelist, M. Castello Branco, one of the school of which M. de Gueiros is the chief. M. Branco had long been in ill health. Mr. Oliver Bunce, a well-known American man of letters, is dead.

OUR Athens Correspondent reports the death of a notable champion of Hellenic education in Turkey, the President of the Greek Philological Association of Constantinople, Dr. H. Vassia. He was a native of Epirus, and educated in France and Germany as a physician; but he devoted himself mainly to philology. He published an edition of the Olynthiacs of Demosthenes, and wrote on the geography and epigraphy of Thrace.

THE chief Parliamentary Papers of the week are India, Army System, Correspondence (2s.); Copy of the Indian Financial Statement for 1890-91, and of the Proceedings of the Legislative Council of the Governor-General thereon (1s.); Report on the Labour Agitation and Recent Strikes in France (1d.); and Annual Statement of the Trade of the United Kingdom for 1889 (3s. 3d.).

SCIENCE

ELEMENTARY TEXT-BOOKS.

The Uses and Triumphs of Mathematics: its Beauties and Attractions popularly treated in the Language of Every-day Life. By V. E. Johnson, B.A. (Griffith, Farran & Co.)—This book consists of a series of short chapters in the style of drawing-room lectures of a rather formal kind. It abounds with instances of the achievements of mathematics, well selected, but not very novel or recondite; and each chapter winds up with a poetical quotation, usually from Emerson. The author is very severe on advocates of a fourth dimension, and is a staunch upholder of the practical and useful.

The Elements of Astronomy: a Text-Book for use in High Schools and Academies, with a Uranography. By Charles A. Young, Ph.D., LL.D. (Ginn & Co.)—The author's recent publication 'General Astronomy for Colleges and Scientific Schools' is already so well known that an extended notice of the present is not needed. Much of the material of the larger book in question has naturally been incorporated in this; nevertheless it is in no respect a mere abridgment of the former, the whole being rewritten and adapted to a somewhat different class of students, whilst in the process the information has undergone careful revision. It has been well remarked that in an elementary text-book some statements must be incomplete, but it is important that all should be accurate as far as they go, and Prof. Young has devoted special attention to securing this in the work before us. We trust that one result will be the stimulating of a taste for astronomy, which is still far too little studied amongst us. In the text no mathematics higher than elementary algebra and geometry is introduced, though occasionally a trigonometrical formula appears in the foot-notes and in the Appendix, to which have been relegated certain matters not essential to the course, including a brief description of astronomical instruments and of methods of observation, particularly with reference to the determination of solar and stellar parallax. At the end of the book is given, under the name "Uranography," a brief description of the constellations visible in the United States, with a set of star-maps and lists of objects observable with a small telescope; this is pagged and titled separately, that it may be used either in connexion with the author's 'General Astronomy' or with any other text-book, or by itself in the open air at night.

MR. W. S. DALLAS, F.L.S.

By the death of Mr. William Sweetland Dallas the Geological Society has lost a respected officer, who for more than twenty years had conducted its affairs and edited its Journal with great ability. In early life Mr. Dallas made his mark as an entomologist, and contributed to the Transactions of the Entomological Society and to the Annals of Natural History several original papers on hemipterous insects. Before his appointment to the assistant-secretaryship of the Geological Society he had been Curator of the Yorkshire Philosophical Society's Museum; but whatever his official position he always devoted his leisure to scientific literature. At one time he was editor of the Popular Science Review, and up to the day of his death was one of the editors of the Annals of Natural History. Mr. Dallas's linguistic attainments led to his translation of a large number of works, the best known being Oswald Heer's 'Primeval World of Switzerland,' in two volumes; Fritz Müller's 'Facts and Arguments for Darwin'; Büchner's 'Man: Past and Present'; Nitzsch's 'Pterylography'; and Siebold's 'True Parthenogenesis in Moths and Bees.' Mr. Dallas was the author of a work entitled 'Elements of Entomology' and of 'A Natural History of the Animal Kingdom,' the latter republished from Orr's 'Circle of the Sciences.' He had also been a copious contributor to serial literature, and to such works as Cassell's 'Natural History' and the Zoological Record. Possessed of a dignified presence, coupled with great geniality of manner, Mr. Dallas was always popular in scientific circles, and his death at the age of sixty-six will be very widely regretted. His physical constitution had been undermined by excessive literary industry, and the paralysis which had threatened him for some time took fatal effect on the 29th ult. He leaves a widow and two daughters.

NEW GUINEA.

A BLUE-BOOK (c. 5883, 1890) recently issued contains some letters from Mr. John Douglas, late Special Commissioner, and Sir William Macgregor, the Administrator of British New Guinea, which throw some interesting light on the condition of the natives and on the steps which are being taken for their improvement. The progress is necessarily slow, not merely from the large area involved and from the limited means at the governor's disposal, but from the very conditions of the case. In dealing with cases of murder, which is the principal cause of trouble, great difficulty is caused by the fixed idea of the natives, not merely that the crime can be wiped out by payment—and this on a scale adapted to the most limited incomes—but also that, failing payment, the responsibility is not individual, but communal. Still several expeditions for the purpose of arresting murderers have ended successfully, thanks to the tact and presence of mind of Sir W. Macgregor, though at a risk to himself which we venture to think excessive. He found that, relatively to the coast tribes, the savagery of those inland, and especially the mountain tribes, is much greater than was supposed; and he gives a melancholy description of the terrified and half-starved remnant of the Veiburi, a tribe which he discovered to be in process of extermination by a dreaded mountain neighbour, the Manugoro. Most of these villages possess one or two dobos, or houses built in trees as a point of vantage for defence. In Veiburi, however, nearly the whole village was built in one enormous tree, i.e., four large houses, some apparently with two stories, and several platforms on which stones and other missiles are stored; but the arboreal life, or the anxieties it implies, had produced a miserable population. The largest tribe yet met with is the Aroma, about 100 miles east from Port Moresby, numbering some 4,000. Cloudy Bay, a little further eastward, also contains some powerful and warlike tribes, and these districts have been surveyed and visited with the best effect. The native teachers, and chiefs under their influence, are frequently useful, trustworthy men. One of these chiefs, being asked if he had been concerned in a certain murder, replied, "No, too much fear God," which appeared to be true; but his followers hastened to explain that they had all been at church at the time. Unluckily, the murder proved to have been committed on a Monday. At several places the natives said they had given up holding services as the preaching produced bad crops.

Sir W. Macgregor reports a visit to the islands of Sudest and St. Aignan, where several hundred gold-diggers from Queensland were at work, but as far as could be ascertained they were not on an average getting more than one or two penny-weights a day.

It seems probable that the economical development of the country will be slow. Traces of iron and of plumbago have been found in the Cloudy Bay district, and the latter may prove to be workable; but the climate there during the rainy months tells severely not only on Europeans, but on the natives, the jungle being besides uninhabitable there owing to the "scrub itch." Leprosy was observed among the natives, along with bad forms of ringworm and elephantiasis; but hygienic measures may do much for them when confidence is established. We are glad to see that the native names of islands and rivers are gradually superseding those scattered broadcast by recent explorers.

SOCIETIES.

GEOLOGICAL.—May 21.—Dr. A. Geikie, President, in the chair.—Messrs. G. Fletcher and T. Ward were elected Fellows.—The following communications were read: 'On some Devonian and Silurian Ostracoda from North America, France, and the Bosphorus,' by Prof. T. R. Jones; 'On the Age, Composition, and Structure of the Plateau-gravels of East Berkshire and West Surrey,' by the Rev. A. Irving; 'Further Note on the Existence of Triassic Rocks in the English Channel off the Coast of Cornwall,' by Mr. R. N. Worth; and 'On a New Species of Coccodus (C. lindströmi, Davis),' by Mr. J. W. Davis.

MICROSCOPICAL.—May 21.—Mr. J. Glaisher, V.P., in the chair.—Mr. Mayall referred to the donation, by Messrs. Trainini Brothers, opticians of Brescia, of an early form of achromatic microscope objective, constructed by the late Bernardino Marzoli, Curator of the Physical Laboratory of the Lyceum of Brescia. The objective was a cemented combination, and was described and figured in the 'Commentari della Accademia di Scienze' of Brescia in 1808. This and other works and documents in proof of its genuineness were exhibited.—Mr. Mayall exhibited on behalf of Mr. P. Vallance an eyepiece similar to that shown at the previous meeting by Mr. Goodwin. It was one of two constructed by Mr. Murrell nearly forty years ago, and was provided with a screw which enabled the compound eye-lens to be adjusted with reference to the field lens through a space of nearly $\frac{1}{2}$ in.—Mr. E. M. Nelson read a paper 'On Micrometers,' in the course of which he described a new micrometer made for him by Messrs. Powell & Lealand. The subject was illustrated by a drawing upon the board, and the micrometer, attached to a microscope and lamp, was handed round the room.—Mr. T. Comber's paper 'On a Simple Form of Heliostat and its Application to Photo-micrography' was read. Apart from the question of the extreme simplicity of the heliostat—which was mainly due to limiting the reflection of the mirror to the polar direction and deflecting the pencil in the horizontal direction in the axis of the microscope by means of a fixed mirror placed at half the angle of the latitude above the heliostat mirror—Mr. Comber had rendered important service to photo-micrography by showing how the heliostat might be placed close to the microscope, so that the error due to slight inaccuracy of the adjustment of the heliostat might escape the optical leverage which took place when the reflected beam was made to travel through a considerable space.

ROYAL INSTITUTION.—June 2.—Sir J. C. Browne, Treas. and V.P., in the chair.—Dr. C. J. Cullingworth, Dr. R. Messel, Messrs. J. Hutchinson, H. C. Mylne, and D. Rylands were elected Members.

SOCIETY OF ENGINEERS.—June 2.—Mr. H. Adams, President, in the chair.—A paper was read by Mr. P. F. Nursey (past President) 'On Pick's System of manufacturing Salt in vacuo.'

SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL ARCHÆOLOGY.—June 3.—Mr. P. Le Page Renouf, President, in the chair.—A paper by Prof. Maspero, 'Sur les Dynasties Divines de l'Ancienne Egypte,' was read by the Secretary.

ANTHROPOLOGICAL INSTITUTE.—May 13.—Dr. J. G. Garson, V.P., in the chair.—The election of Mr. S. Edwards and Dr. W. S. Lane was announced.—Mr. F. Galton exhibited a new instrument for measuring the rate of movement of the various limbs. The method adopted was explained by referring to the action of a spring measuring tape. When the end of one of these is pulled out and then let go, it springs sharply back, the tape running cleanly through a slit. If it runs back more quickly than the hand could follow it, then if the end of the tape be retained in the hand that gives the blow, the tape will run through the slit at the exact rate at which the blow is given. The hand need not be near the tape; it may be connected with it by a long thread, and the instrument will thus be guarded from injury. The thread, during part of its course, is arranged to travel vertically, and passes through a small inverted cone which is fixed to it; it then passes loosely through a cylindrical bead of white ivory, the lower end of which rests on the base of the cone. When the moving thread is suddenly arrested, the bead is tossed up to a height dependent on the velocity of the thread at the time and place when it was stopped. The momentary pause of the white bead when it ceases to ascend, and before it begins to descend, enables the height it has attained to be read off upon an appropriate scale, which tells at how many feet per second the thread was moving at the time it was checked.—Dr. G. W. Leitner read a paper 'On the Ethnographical Basis of Language, with special reference to the Customs and Language of Hunza.' The Hunzas are nominal Mohammedans, and they use their mosques for drinking and dancing assemblies. There is little restriction in the relation of the sexes, and the management of the state, in theory, is attributed to fairies. No war is undertaken unless the fairy gives the command by beating the sacred drum. The people are not true Mohammedans, but represent what is still left of the doctrine of the Sheikh-ul-Jabl, or the Old Man of the Mountain, the head of the so-called Assassins. The language of the Hunza is one of the most primitive, and has not yet emerged from the state in which it is impossible to have such a word as "head," as distinguished from "my head," or "thy head," or "his head"; for instance, ak is "my name," and ik is "his name." Take away the pronominal sign, and k alone is left, which means nothing. Aus is "my wife," and gus "thy wife." The s alone has no meaning, and in some cases it seemed impossible to arrive at putting anything down correctly; but so it is in the initial stage of a language; in the Hunza language that stage is important to us as members of the Aryan group, as the dissociation of the pronoun, verb, adverb, and conjunction from the act or substance only occurs when the language emerges beyond the stage when the groping, as it were, of the human child between the meum and tuum, the first and second persons, approaches the clear perception of the outer world, the sum, the third person.—Mr. A. P. Goodwin read some 'Notes on the Natives of the Interior of New Guinea,' and exhibited a fire-stick.—Mr. G. F. Lawrence exhibited two crania from the Thames.

ARISTOTELIAN.—June 2.—Mr. S. H. Hodgson, President, in the chair.—Papers were read by Mr. G. F. Stout and Prof. Brough on the subject 'Is the Distinction of Feeling, Cognition, and Conation valid as an Ultimate Distinction of the Mental Functions?'—A paper by Prof. Bain on the subject was read by the Honorary Secretary, and a discussion followed.

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.

- Tues. Horticultural, 1; Popular Lecture, 3.
- Royal Institution, 3.—The Natural History of Society, Mr. A. Lang.
- Photographic, 8.
- Colonial Institute, 8.

- THUR. Anthropological Institute, 8½.—'The Nomad Tribes of Asia Minor,' Mr. T. Bent; 'A Contribution to a Scientific Phenology,' Mr. B. Hollander.
- WED. United Service Institution, 3.—'Transport of the Sick and Wounded in Time of War,' Surgeon W. A. Morris.
- THUR. Royal Institution, 8.—'Flame and Explosives,' Prof. Dewar.
- Royal, 4½.—'The Rationale of Indian Railways,' Sir T. C. Hope.
- Mathematical, 8.—'Parabolic Note,' Mr. R. Tucker; 'Further Notes on Simplicissima,' Mr. W. J. C. Sharp; 'Rotatory Polarization,' Dr. J. Larmor; 'The Expression of the Square Root of a Quantic as a Continued Fraction,' Prof. G. H. Mathews.
- Antiquaries, 8½.
- FRI. United Service Institution, 3.—'The Employment of Large Masses of Cavalry, of Movable Fortifications, and of Smokeless Powder, as illustrated by the late German Autumn Manœuvres,' Mr. G. Saunders.
- New Shakspere, 8.—'Much Ado about Nothing,' Mr. H. S. Pearson.
- Astronomical, 8.
- Royal Institution, 8.—'The Physical Foundation of Music,' Prof. S. P. Thompson.
- SAT. Royal Institution 3.—'Ballad Music of the West of England,' Rev. S. Baring-Gould.
- Botanic, 8½.—'Election of Fellows.'

Science Society.

THE second conversazione of the Royal Society is fixed for the 18th of June.

MR. JOHN GUNN, of Norwich, whose death occurred in that city on the 28th ult., should not be allowed to pass away without some record of his labours in geology and archaeology. The son of the rector of Irstead and Barton, he succeeded to that living in 1841, but after forty years of clerical duty resigned his position for conscience' sake. In early life he took great interest in the archaeology of Norfolk, especially in ecclesiastical architecture; but subsequently his attention was given mainly to geology, and he became an enthusiastic collector. His fine collection of local fossils, specially rich in relics of the "Forest bed," he presented to the Norwich Museum. Mr. Gunn at the time of his death was in his eighty-ninth year.

MR. W. F. KIRBY, F.L.S., F.E.S., &c., Assistant in the Zoological Department, British Museum, has in the press a synonymic catalogue of an interesting, but hitherto somewhat neglected group of insects, the Neuroptera Odonata, or dragon-flies, to be published by Messrs. Gurney & Jackson. As soon as this work is completed Mr. Kirby hopes to be able to proceed to press with the first volume of his great catalogue of Lepidoptera Heterocera, or moths, upon which he has been engaged for nearly twenty years.

DR. SCHNEIDER, Professor of Zoology at Breslau, has died there at the age of eighty-nine.

FINE ARTS

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.—THE ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTIETH EXHIBITION IS NOW OPEN.—5, Pall Mall East, from 10 till 6.—Admission, 1s.; Catalogue, 1s. ALFRED D. FRIPP, R.W.S., Secretary.

THE LEGEND OF THE BRIAR ROSE, painted by E. BURNE JONES, A.R.A.

THE LEGEND OF THE BRIAR ROSE.—THE EXHIBITION OF MR. BURNE JONES'S FOUR PICTURES IS NOW OPEN at Messrs. Thos. Agnew & Sons' Old Bond Street Galleries, 39, Old Bond Street, W.—Admission, 1s. 10 to 6 o'clock.

EXHIBITION OF BLACK AND WHITE DRAWINGS.—Messrs. CARSELL & COMPANY'S EIGHTH ANNUAL EXHIBITION OF ORIGINAL DRAWINGS IS NOW OPEN at the MEMORIAL HALL, Farringdon-street, E.C.—Admission free on presentation of address card.

THE TOPOGRAPHY OF OLBA.

In my letter to the Athenæum of April 5th I notified our discovery of two inscriptions giving us the name of Olba. Not satisfied that this was actually the site of the capital of this ancient kingdom, and being unable owing to the season to prosecute our researches more inland, we waited until the spring, and then traversed the whole of the district from the coast to the Karamanian mountains, which in ancient times would seem to have constituted the toparchia of Olba, a part of Cilicia Tracheiotis.

From an inscription on a tomb at the spot where we found the above-mentioned inscriptions we read that those who opened it were to pay so much to Sebaste, and so much to the deme of the Kanygelli, giving us the Sebaste-Eleusa of Ptolemy, which is down by the coast and mentioned by him after Corycos, and the name of one of its demes. From these premises we could safely argue that the rule of Olba extended over Sebaste, and that the priest kings who are styled on coins "dynasts of Olba and toparchs of Kennatis and Lalassis" must have had their capital at some other point which had yet to be found.

From Lamas to the plain of Seleucia the coast line is thickly covered with ruins, including the towns of Sebaste-Eleusa, Corycos, and Corasios; these ruins are, however, almost all of a very late Roman date, and an inscription at Chok Oren (many ruins), not far from the plain of Seleucia, gives in a few words what is probably the history of most of them. It tells us that during the reign of Valentinian, Valens, and Gratian, the governor of Isauria rebuilt from the foundations "the spot which is called Corasios, which had become desolate and void of houses." Whether this is the Coracesium of Strabo or not is uncertain, but the name Corasios is very clear in my squeeze; at all events, it confirms Strabo's description of the devastation of this coast by pirates, accounts for the lateness of the coast-line ruins, and explains why the older inhabitants of Cilicia Tracheia preferred to live in fortified towns up on the slopes of the Taurus.

The mountains in this portion of Cilicia Tracheia come right down to the sea, and the paths inland when once the coast road is quitted present great difficulties to the traveller. A second line of towns occupied the slopes more immediately above the sea level, the names of two of which we were enabled to recover from inscriptions—namely, Eabbasis and Reorbasis—each with strong polygonal fortresses and walls, and each celebrated for the worship of Hermes. Besides these there were several the names of which we were unable to find, but only the signs which were invariably put up on a corner of the towers. Here I may incidentally mention that at eight different sites we discovered the sign of the club, which eventually proved to be the sign of Olba, and, together with the triskelis which surmounted our Olbian inscriptions at Sebaste, is found on Olbian coins (Head, 'Hist. Numorum'). This would give us as the least possible area of this kingdom a boundary on the east beyond the Lamas river, and on the west the valley of the Kalykadnos.

On proceeding further inland, at about seven hours from the coast at Lamas, we halted for some days at extensive ruins now known as Jambesli, about from 3,000 to 4,000 ft. above the sea level, containing fine heros, a sarcophagus, the lid of which is carved into the figure of a lion with its paw on a vase, the characteristic rock carvings, several forts, the ruins of a temple, and a large early Christian basilica. Unfortunately we only found three poor inscriptions here, and were unable to recover the name, but on gateways the sign of the club occurs. The same experience awaited us at the next place, Yiennili, the fortress of which had over the door the club between two triangles.

Our next headquarters were at a small village of Yourouks known as Uzenjaburgh, over 4,000 ft. above the sea level, very cold even in April, but situated amongst very extensive ruins, which proved to be the capital of Olba. First of all we examined the ruins of an extensive town down in a valley about three miles below Uzenjaburgh. These ruins crown a wooded height surrounded on two sides by narrow gorges crowded with rock carvings and rock-cut tombs, and on the third by a little fertile plain. This spot the nomads now call Oura. (Prof. Ramsay previous to this imagined that the original name of Olba was Ourra, Hellenized to suggest a meaning in connexion with ὄλβος.) In ancient times water was conveyed to this town by a fine aqueduct from the Lamas river; and on the arches which span one of the gorges is a long inscription, dreadfully obliterated, but from which we were able, with a considerable amount of personal risk, to get a squeeze of the words ΟΑΒΕΩΝΗΘΙΟΛΙΣ, and read the name of M. Aurelius Caesar. Oura also had a small theatre, a curious fountain, and yielded one or two minor inscriptions. It is connected with the ruins around Uzenjaburgh by an ancient paved road, on either side of which are numerous rock-cut tombs and other ruins, and the name of Olba again occurred on a fallen column. It would appear that in ancient times the two towns practically joined, and formed the capital of the kingdom of Olba.

A very large tower, four stories high, with five chambers on each floor, commands the ruins of the upper town; it is 50 ft. 10 in. by 40 ft. 9 in.; and on this fortress are four separate inscriptions, and a very neatly carved club in a frame. The most important of these inscriptions has almost the same formula of dedication as that to the Olbian Jove at Sebaste; again the same strange name Tarkuarius follows that of the priest king Teucer—in the list of names referred to below we found ΤΑΡΚΥΜΒΙΟΥ, possibly Tarkuarius for life (μετά βίον), and we know of king Tarkondimotos of Cilicia, so perhaps the prefix Tark has some royal significance—then follows a long Cilician name, and the inscription closes with ΤΟ ΟΡΒΑΑΗΣΗΤΑΟΑΒΕΩΣ, probably giving us the name of this fortress town which was above the town of Olba.

Amongst these ruins the most conspicuous are those of a very large temple with twelve Corinthian columns, 40 ft. high, on either side two to the front and four to the back, each with twenty-three flutings; the building is 127 ft. long, and the proaulon wall which encircles it, and which is covered with marks and letters, is 222 ft. by 209 ft. This temple is wonderfully well preserved, having been a Christian church when Olba was metropolis of Isauria. There can be no doubt that this was the great temple of Jove to which Strabo alludes, the priest kings of which he tells us ruled over the whole of the Tracheiotis at one time, so that even in Strabo's time the terms were in use "the country of Teucer" and "the priesthood of Teucer" (Strabo, xii. 1).

There are two theatres on this site, a late Roman arch, a very elegant façade of a temple of Tyche, with a long inscription which identifies it, and from another inscription we found that Dionysos was also worshipped here; and there must have been a plentiful vintage in ancient times, judging from the number of wine-presses and the vats for storing wine. The general appearance of these ruins is very striking. There must also have been a colonnade like that at Pompeiopolis, and public buildings of a large extent cover the whole of the hill-slope. The largest of the theatres, however, is very small, being only 291 ft. on its outer semicircle; behind stood a colonnade of magnificent columns; but as there is a second and smaller theatre, and another at Oura, the inhabitants of Olba were not badly provided for in this respect.

There are no traces of city walls; but from its position on the highest ground of the immediate district, with gorges of magnificent rockiness running down to right and left as from a watershed, and with its strong castle, the position of Olba must have ensured absolute immunity from attack. The upper town was furnished with a separate aqueduct, and drew its water supply from the sources of the Lamas beyond Mara.

Our next work was to investigate the Lamas gorge from its mouth by the sea to its source in the mountains of Karamania. It is quite one of the finest works of nature I have ever seen, being never more than half a mile wide, and the precipitous cliffs on either side offering, except at rare intervals, two continuous walls of 1,000 ft. in height. At a distance of every two or three miles we came across the ruins of castles and towns on either side, and abundant evidence of the rule of Olba from the oft recurring sign of the club. But only in one case did our inscriptions give us the name of the town, namely, Bemisos, which from the magnitude of its ruins must have been nearly as large and important as Olba itself, and had its own particular sign, the shield and spear, which appeared side by side with the club.

The features of this district are the rock-cut reliefs of men in armour with lance and spear—there are several of them in the Lamas gorge—and the sanctity of caves dedicated to Hermes and walled up with polygonal masonry. We found three of these caves in the toparchia of Olba: one near Eabbasis, three stories in height, with several inscriptions; another near Bemisos, in the Lamas gorge; and a third, also with an inscription, in a gorge near Maidan, or Reorbasis, as the town was presumably called in ancient times. On coins of Corycos Hermes figures largely, and in this district we found many caducei carved over gateways or on the rocks.

Of course the great caves or natural holes on the plateau near the sea constitute the most familiar feature of the district, for one of them is the far-famed Corycian cave, the abode of the giant Typhon (Pind. 'Pyth.' i. 31). Then we have the Olbian cave previously described, which resembles the Corycian in almost every particular, and near the Corycian cave there is a third, the most terrible of them all; it is smaller in circumference, but deeper, not less than 250 ft. Into this no one can now descend, for it is all sloping in from the edge; its aspect is terrible, as it is full of stalactites, and the nomads call it Purgatory, whereas the Corycian cave they call Paradise, for they can grow crops at the bottom of it, and it affords them stabling for their flocks.

By stopping several days in a ruin near the edge of the Corycian cave, we were able to study it closely and supplement considerably the information given by previous travellers. At the entrance to the hole itself, which penetrates the bowels of the earth for over 200 ft., we unearthed a quaint four-versed epic cut on the rock; it is in hexameter and pentameter, and breathes the spirit of the divine mystery, which here uttered the frenzied oracles. Much in the same strain is a Christian inscription over the door of a Byzantine church which blocks up the entrance to the hole. In ancient times this hole was evidently walled in, and if the debris of the fallen wall could be removed much more of interest might be brought to light.

Immediately above the cave stand the ruins of a Christian church, built with stones from a temple of Jupiter, the remains of which crown an eminence about a mile above the cave. At one edge of this church we accidentally discovered that stones with many letters on them had been walled up. It was the work of a day to clear these stones, and there we found a list of 162 names, some with and some without patronymics. The earliest of these show many curious Cilician names, which run gradually into Greek names, which in their turn become mixed with Roman ones.

On carefully studying this long list, I am inclined to think that they form a list of the priest kings who, Strabo tells us, ruled over the Tracheiotis, for the following reasons: Firstly, we have the name Teucer frequently repeated; secondly, the name Polemon occurs, which we find on coins as dynast of Olba; thirdly, Hermocrates, a priest whose name occurs in an inscription at Eabbasis; fourthly, there are several of the name of Zenophanes, one of whom Strabo tells us was the father of Aba and one of the tyrants of Olba; and, fifthly, the last of the names is Archelaus, and Strabo tells us how this portion of Cilicia Tracheia was handed over by Augustus to Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, and he ruled over the whole district, except Seleucia, until his death, when Cilicia Tracheia became a Roman province. His favourite residence was at Eleusa-Sebaste just below, which he beautified, and the lettering of the name looks as if it were of the period in question. Three of the stones of names were unfortunately too obliterated to read, and one was upside down, the only evidence we had to prove that the building was erected with stones previously used until we visited the temple of Zeus on the hill above, which was built of similar stones, and of which very little is left standing. Hence the presumption is that this list of names was cut on the walls of the former temple, and brought down for building purposes by later inhabitants. Close to the temple we found a dedication to the Corycian Jove in similar phraseology to that of the Olbian Jove, and a scribbling on the wall invoking the deity.

Although Corycos itself must at one time have been autonomous, it probably formed a part of the kingdom of Olba for a considerable period; and as for the cave and temple, which is at some distance from the town and wholly unprotected, it must have been under the control of the rulers of the Tracheiotis, a district which in antiquity had a very large population, as traces of towns, villages, and fertility occur at very close intervals, but which is now given up to brushwood, and inhabited solely during winter and spring by the nomad tribes, who find here a pasturage for their flocks.

J. THEODORE BENT.

THE INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITIONS AT GLASGOW AND EDINBURGH.

17, Hamilton Terrace, N.W., June 4, 1890.

MR. F. DILLON, in your issue of the 31st ult., relates how, after soliciting him by "special invitation" to contribute a picture to the Edinburgh International Exhibition, the committee neglected to hang the work he sent, and returned it to him without note or comment.

I can fully sympathize with Mr. Dillon in what is, I fear, but too common a practice with the management of exhibitions north of the Tweed. In 1888 I, by "special invitation," sent a picture to the Glasgow International Exhibition. It was not hung, but sent back to me without a word of apology. Many English artists, Mr. Dillon, as he states, being among the number, were snubbed in the same way. I need not point out how such a policy is scarcely likely to increase the value or interest of Scottish exhibitions, or to induce English artists to contribute to them. I felt I had no remedy against this high-handed treatment, but eased my heart by writing a playful letter to the committee, complimenting them on the manner in which they had once more scored against the Sassenach, and so further avenged the field of Flodden.

To that letter, up to the present, I have received no reply. H. STACY MARKS.

SALES.

MESSRS. CHRISTIE, MANSON & WOODS sold on the 31st ult. the following, from the collection of the late Mr. W. Webster. Drawings: H. B. Willis, Near Portmadoc, 110*l*. T. M. Richardson, Ragusa, on the Adriatic, 152*l*. S. Austin, Canal at Bruges, 66*l*. D. Cox, View of Hay, Breconshire, 56*l*. C. Fielding, A Village under the South Downs, with cattle in the foreground, 173*l*. J. Linnell, Milking-Time, 94*l*. P. De Wint, An Extensive View in Kent, 73*l*. A View in Wales, with cottages and figures, 115*l*. The Ford, 76*l*. Bridge on the Thames, 57*l*. Pictures: G. B. O'Neill, A Children's Party, 252*l*. W. Müller, A View at Tivoli, with peasants and goats, 215*l*. T. Faed, Returning Home, 183*l*. The Squire's Visit to a Village School, 162*l*. W. Linnell, Across the Common, 378*l*. J. T. Linnell, Sultry Hours, 315*l*. Hill and Dale, 315*l*. A. Solomon, Brunetta and Phyllis, 351*l*. Third Class, and First Class, 105*l*. P. R. Morris, Breezy June, 210*l*. T. Webster, Breakfast, 304*l*. Sir D. Wilkie, Chelsea Pensioners reading the Gazette (the sketch), 215*l*.

The same auctioneers sold on the 3rd inst. the following engravings, from various collections: Salisbury, after J. Constable, by D. Lucas, 31*l*. The Night Watch, after Rembrandt, by C. Waltner, 52*l*. Lady Gower and Child, after Sir T. Lawrence, by S. Cousins, 37*l*. La Surprise, after Dubufe, by S. Cousins, 37*l*. After Sir E. Landseer: Bolton Abbey, by S. Cousins, 40*l*. Spaniel and Pheasant, and The Retriever and Woodcock, by T. Landseer, 73*l*. Laying down the Law, by T. Landseer, 36*l*. Bolton Abbey in the Olden Time, by S. Cousins, 53*l*. Deer Pass, by T. Landseer, 42*l*. Night and Morning, by T. Landseer, 53*l*. The Challenge, by J. Burnet, 39*l*. Odin, by T. Landseer, 59*l*. Hafed, by C. G. Lewis, 51*l*. Dignity and Impudence, by T. Landseer, 43*l*. The Stag at Bay, by T. Landseer, 31*l*. Hunters at Grass, by C. G. Lewis, 130*l*. The Monarch of the Glen, by T. Landseer, 69*l*; another copy, 60*l*.

Fine-Art Gossip.

On Monday next Messrs. Christie, Manson & Woods will sell a collection of water-colour drawings which belonged to the late Sir J. Heron, of Manchester, comprising examples by Turner of Oxford; R. Dadd; W. Hunt, including some early productions which are more fine than popular; Girtin; Glover; Stanfield, 'Calais Old Pier'; G. Cattermole, 'The Convent Chapel'; Prout, 'St. Pierre, Caen'; D. Cox, 'Penmaenmawr' and 'The Skirts of the Forest'; seven De Wints; and Turner, 'Corfe Castle' (engraved in 'The Southern Coast'), 'Interior of Canterbury Cathedral', 'St. Albans', 'Dunstanborough, Sunrise,' and sixteen others. On the 7th inst. the same firm will sell the modern pictures and drawings collected by Mr. F. W. Grafton, deceased, and others, comprising drawings by Sir J. Gilbert, 'Hotspur, Mortimer, Worcester, and Glendower'; Turner, 'Great Malvern Abbey'; and Mr. B. Riviere's 'Comala,'—and pictures by E. Frère, 'Blowing Bubbles' and 'Faggot Gatherers'; Mr. H. W. B. Davis; E. Duverger; T. Faed; J. Israëls; J. Linnell, 'A Harvest Scene,' 'A Woody River Scene,' and 'A River Scene, with figures,' 1837; Sir J. Millais, 'Baptism of Guthren the Dane'; J. Phillip, and P. F. Poole. On the 14th inst. the same firm will sell pictures collected by the late Mr. G. Perkins, of Chipstead, comprising many examples mentioned by Smith, and including Both's 'Muleteers in a Rocky Country' (Smith, 112); Cuy's 'Seven Cows' (Smith, 149); Hobbema's 'Château of Kostverloren' (Smith, 116); Metsu's 'Music Lesson' (1659); 'A Village Interior' and two others, by A. Van Ostade; Rembrandt's 'A Gentleman' (Smith, 376); Ruysdael's 'Rocky Landscape' (Smith, 264); and other examples by Jan Steen, Teniers, P. Wouwermans, Wynants, Murillo, Pordenone, S. Rosa, Gainsborough, Wilkie ('Guess my Name!'), R. Wilson, and Claude.

In the National Gallery, Room XIV., numbered 1302 and 1303 respectively, and hung on a screen, are two small panels, probably parts of a retable. The former is described as 'The Soul of St. Bertin borne to Heaven,' the latter as 'A Choir of Angels.' They are by Simon Marmion, ob. 1489, and have been already mentioned in these columns. In Room XIX., numbered 1306, is 'A Landscape, with Figures and Cattle,' by Thomas Barker (1769-1847), a broadly painted picture, bought with part of the Lewis Fund. No. 1307, in the same room, is 'Portrait of Miss Caroline Fry,' by Sir T. Lawrence, a bequest from Mr. W. Wilson.

THE death is announced of Mr. Thomas Hughes, F.S.A., of Chester. He was at one period a member of the firm of Minshull & Hughes, booksellers in that city. He was prominent as a Cheshire antiquary, and was the author of various books of local interest. Mr.

Hughes died on the 30th of last month, at the age of sixty-four.

MR. HENRY WALLIS has returned from the East, one of the objects of his journey there having been to continue his researches into the history and characteristics of Byzantine pottery. We recently noticed the latest fasciculus of his studies of early Oriental ceramic art, and are now glad to learn that this publication will be continued. He would be glad to hear, at Woodbury, Biggin Hill, Norwood, S.E., from possessors of examples, some of which may be in public and private collections. It is presumed that specimens exist in various hands which till now have been ascribed to other sources than that to which Mr. Wallis is giving special and profitable attention.

THE tenth annual autumn exhibition of modern pictures in the Castle at Nottingham will be opened on the 6th of September next. The museum there has been enriched by the gift, by Mr. Felix Joseph, of a collection of original drawings for book illustrations, dating from the beginning of this century, and in fifty-nine large frames, comprising designs by Stoddard, Westall, W. Hamilton, S. Wale, J. and C. Varley, G. F. Sargent, and others.

THE tenth volume of the "Gentleman's Magazine Library," issued by Mr. Stock, will contain 'Architectural Antiquities,' and will be the first of two volumes on the subject.

It is proposed to publish by subscription a series of twelve etchings of the most interesting vestiges of the antiquities of Southampton, by Mr. Frank McFadden. The first etching will be published in June, and the others will be issued at intervals of about a month. A description of each plate will be supplied by Mr. T. W. Shore.

A TELEGRAM from New York announces the death, which occurred on Monday last, of Mr. Matt Morgan, who was a number of years ago known in London as a designer of cartoons for some of the comic serials.

M. DELAHAUTE has declared that the picture '1814,' by M. Meissonier, sold with the Collection Porto-Riche for 131,000 fr., has nothing in common with the painting with the same title which, with a Greuze and a Detaille, he sold to a dealer who soon afterwards resold them to M. Chauchard for 850,000 fr. At the Exposition Meissonier, Paris, 1884, there were two pictures, Nos. 60 and 63, both named '1814,' one signed and dated "1863," the other "1864." They differ materially in size.

THE Louvre has obtained an important addition in the 'Calvaire,' comprising life-size figures carved in oak, a work of the sixteenth century, which was formerly in a church at Nivelles. The same museum is shortly to be extended by means of a newly-opened salle, containing antiquities from Tunis and Algeria.

THE death, on the 24th ult., of the Belgian marine painter M. Louis Artan is announced.

THE only Medal of the First Class for painting awarded in the current Salon has been given to M. de Richemont MM. Charpentier and Puech have Medals of the First Class for their sculptures. In architecture M. Redon has a Médaille d'Honneur, and MM. Fournereau and Alexandre Marcel, Medals of the First Class. In engraving (burin) M. Lévy has a First Class Medal.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—'La Sonnambula,' 'La Traviata,' 'Il Don Giovanni,' 'Roméo et Juliette,' ST. JAMES'S HALL.—The Richter Concerts.

SINCE our last notice four more operas have been added to the repertory of the season, and the fact that in no instance have any serious proofs of hasty preparation been observable speaks well indeed for the energy and skill of Mr. Augustus Harris. If he would evince as much care in the selection of recruits for his company as he does in the management of his stage the debt which the public owes to him would be largely increased. We believe that it was Madame Etelka Gerster's wish to reappear in 'La Sonnambula,' but the result of the experiment on Thursday last week was not such as to cause a desire for its repetition. It was not without a feeling of pity that the listener noted the decay of the artist's vocal powers. The perfect method was as conspicuous as ever, but the power of Madame Gerster to render the music according to her own intentions was not forthcoming. She will be wise to rest content with the reputation she gained in the past, when she was unsurpassable in light soprano parts. There is no necessity to dwell on the rest of the performance. Signor Ravelli sang well as Elvino, M. E. de Reszke was, of course, unexceptionable as the Count, and Mesdames Sinico and Bauermeister completed an excellent cast.

'La Traviata,' like other operas of its period, seems to be declining in popularity, for last Saturday's performance did not draw a large audience. Despite her good voice and method, Miss Ella Russell is rather conventional, not to say mechanical, in her treatment of Verdi's florid music, though her intelligence is never at fault. M. Montariol was acceptable as Alfredo, but Signor Palermini, who sang at Her Majesty's last year, made little impression as the elder Germont. The hackneyed opera was put on the stage with great care.

There are so many important parts in Mozart's 'Don Giovanni' that a wholly satisfactory performance is a rarity, and, in fact, has not been witnessed in London since Mr. Mapleson secured "combination casts" in the best days of Her Majesty's Theatre. Still within recent years we have not had a more creditable interpretation than that of last Monday. The new Donna Anna, Madame Tavary, proved far more acceptable than any of the previous débütantes this season. Her voice may have lost its pristine freshness, but her method is excellent, and her declamation extremely fine. In the present scarcity of dramatic sopranos Madame Tavary is a decided acquisition. Mlle. Zélie de Lussan merits great praise for her embodiment of Zerlina; indeed, she was the best representative of the part we have had since Madame Patti ceased to play it. Signor d'Andrade as the Don, Signor Ravelli as Ottavio, M. Isnardon as Leporello, and Madame Nordica as Elvira were almost unexceptionable; and Mr. Plunket Greene made a creditable first appearance as the Commendatore. Mozart's accompaniments were beautifully played under Mr. Randegger's direction.

The performances of Gounod's 'Roméo et Juliette' in French on Tuesday came little short of perfection. M. Jean de Reszke as Romeo was, as usual, above criticism, and Madame Melba sang the music of Juliet with much charm, though her manner was a little impassive. M. E. de Reszke was again magnificent as the Friar; and other excellent impersonations were those of Tybalt by M. Montariol, Capulet by M. Cabalet, a new-comer, and Mercutio by M. Dufriche, whose vibrato was less objectionable than before. The small parts of Stephano and the Duke had efficient representatives in Mlle. Pinkert, a young Polish singer of some promise, and Mr. Plunket Greene. A special word of praise is due to Signor Mancinelli for the delicacy of the accompaniments. He has evidently learnt that educated English audiences require something beyond mere noise in orchestral playing. Gounod's opera is far more effective in French than either in Italian or English, and, as now performed at Covent Garden, it cannot fail to remain attractive.

The number of scenes from 'The Nibelung's Ring' available for performance in the concert-room is not yet exhausted, and there are some yet remaining which would prove more effective than those introduced at the Richter Concert on Monday evening. The first of the latter was the opening scene in the third act of 'Siegfried,' where the Wanderer summons Erda that he may gain wisdom from her lips as on past occasions. It is remarkable even in Wagner's gigantic score for the skilful interweaving of themes, and the climax, when the "world's heritage" motive breaks in like a ray of light, is magnificent. The vocalists were Miss Lena Little and Mr. Max Heinrich, and as both had evidently made a careful study of the music the result was a very fine performance. Mr. Max Heinrich was even more effective in the other fresh excerpt, namely, the third scene from the second act of 'Götterdämmerung,' where Hagen summons Gunther's vassals to their master's wedding with Brünnhilde. The male voices of the Richter Choir rendered fair justice to the choral work, though they scarcely infused the requisite amount of spirit into the music. Another item of interest in the programme was Brahms's fine Rhapsody for contralto solo and male chorus, from Goethe's 'Hartzeise in Winter.' This piece is rarely heard, perhaps because of its sombre character, but it is worthy of the same hand that penned the 'Schicksalslied' and the 'Gesang der Parzen.' Miss Lena Little rendered the solo part with much expression. The concert commenced with Goldmark's overture 'Im Frühling,' which was performed very recently at the Crystal Palace, and closed with Mozart's 'Linz' Symphony, which has also been noticed on more than one occasion this season. We are requested to note that the concert of June 30th will be given in conjunction with the Wagner Society. The programme will, of course, be entirely composed of the master's works, including the Overture to 'Die Feen,' Elizabeth's Prayer, the Siegfried Idyl, the third scene of the third act of 'Die Walküre,' and the Symphony in C.

Musical Gossip.

M. SAEPELNKOFF scarcely satisfied expectation at his recital which took place at St. James's Hall on Friday last week. That in a technical sense he is a superb performer is beyond all question; but his rendering of Beethoven's 'Sonata Appassionata' was not specially remarkable, and in some Chopin pieces, notably the Fantasia in F minor and the hackneyed Polonaise in A flat, he showed little intimacy with the spirit of the Polish composer. The playing was not only accurate, but powerful; nevertheless, it left no abiding impression on the mind. It must be said to M. Sapellnikoff's credit, however, that he indulged neither in affectations nor mannerisms, and moreover the number of executants of the first rank who have recently appeared is so large that the standard of criticism is necessarily much higher than it was twenty years ago.

THE small attendance at Mr. Kuhe's concert at the Albert Hall on Saturday last affords further proof that the old-fashioned miscellaneous concert is no longer attractive to the public. Madame Patti could not sing, but several other eminent artists were announced, and the reappearance of Madame Albani after her American tour might have been regarded as interesting to a section of the public. Beyond recording the fact that the Canadian prima donna sang with undiminished brilliancy there is no need to speak as to what was done. Amateurs no longer care for this class of entertainment, and there is really no reason to regret their change of taste.

THE Princes' Concert Society, which gave a decidedly agreeable concert of a high class on Thursday last week at the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours, is the most recently formed of the musical clubs whose influence on the art bids fair to become noteworthy for good or ill in the near future. Our own views on the matter are, on the whole, optimistic. That the growth of the amateur element in musical work is likely to prove detrimental to the interests of the profession is in the highest degree unlikely. Public taste is advancing by leaps and bounds, and when amateurs appear on the concert platform or the operatic stage they will be so severely judged that it will be more and more necessary for them to prepare for the ordeal by a diligent course of training under professional supervision. In this way musicians will reap benefit from the present upheaval, and on all grounds we deem it worthy of encouragement. It should be said, however, that the executive at the concert named above was mainly professional, though nothing was done of a nature to warrant criticism.

MR. MANNS went to Bristol on Tuesday to conduct a rehearsal of 400 members of the Bristol Choral Society who will take part in the performance of 'St. Paul' at the Crystal Palace on the 21st inst. He was much pleased with the firm attack, full tone, and intelligent phrasing of the West-country amateurs.

HERR WILLY HESS, the leader of Sir Charles Halle's Manchester orchestra, gave a concert at the Princes' Hall on Tuesday afternoon. The soundness of his mechanism was displayed to advantage in Rust's Sonata in D minor and Ernst's Concerto (with piano accompaniment) in F sharp minor, though as abstract music these works are not particularly interesting. Some vocal pieces were contributed by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, the latter introducing a charming little 'May Song,' by Arthur Hervey.

AMONG the performances of the past few days to which it is impossible to give more than formal record are the following: The chamber concert of the Royal College of Music, on Thursday last week; Mr. Oberthür's concert, on Saturday afternoon, in the Princes' Hall; Madame Sophie Löwe's concert, on Thursday evening, and Signor Denza's concert, on Saturday evening, both at the Princes' Hall; and the pianoforte recital of Madame Frickenhaus at the Steinway Hall, on Wednesday afternoon, in which the principal features of the programme were Beethoven's Sonata in E, Op. 109, and Schumann's 'Faschingschwank.'

Two new operas were produced in Paris last week, 'Zaire,' by M. Veronge de la Nux, at the Opéra, and 'La Basoche,' by M. André Messager, at the Opéra Comique. The former seems to be a quasi-failure, but the latter is described as possessing the qualities of the true opéra comique, though the story is slight and rather extravagant. The work will probably be performed in this country by the Carl Rosa Opera Company.

VERY favourable reports are received concerning a one-act operetta, by Signor Mascagni, entitled 'Cavalleria Rusticana,' produced at the Costanzi Theatre in Rome. The work is said to show more promise than anything else of its kind for many years.

At the annual general meeting of the Goethe Gesellschaft, held at Weimar on the 31st ult., it was announced that the poet's musical library had been discovered in the Goethe Museum. It contains, besides Zelter's settings of Goethe's lyrics, the MSS. of many Italian compositions, probably also of the song 'Solitario bosco ombroso,' mentioned in his 'Wahrheit und Dichtung.' The Geheimrat G. von Loeper delivered a Festrede on the occasion.

ON the 8th and 9th inst. a musical festival will take place for the first time in Dortmund, under the direction of M. Janssen. The 'Messiah' is the only work of importance in the scheme.

CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK.

- Mon. Madame Sophie Menter's Pianoforte Recital, 3, St. James's Hall.
 — Mr. J. Robert's Concert, 3, St. James's Hall (Banqueting Hall).
 — Miss Kuhe and Mr. Leo Stern's Concert, 3, Lyric Club.
 — Mr. A. Carli's Concert, 3, Collard & Collard's Concert Rooms.
 — Miss Florence Knight's Concert, 3, 30, Steinway Hall.
 — Chénier & Palmieri's Musical Matinée, 3, 30, Portman Rooms.
 — Misses Grace and Jose Sherrington's Concert, 8, Portman Rooms.
 — Signor di Giambattista's Concert, 8, 15, Steinway Hall.
 — Richter's Concert, 8, 30, St. James's Hall.
 — Royal Italian Opera.
 — Mile. Borowski's Concert, Princes' Hall.
 — First Performance of 'Jan,' by Messrs Robert Martin and Ernest Ford, Opéra Comique Theatre.
 Tues. Miss Rosa Kenney's Dramatic and Musical Matinée, 2, 30, Steinway Hall.
 — Madame Roger-Miclos's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Princes' Hall.
 — Mr. Henry Phillips's Concert, 3, St. James's Hall.
 — Miss Florence Knight's Concert, 3, Collard & Collard's Concert Rooms.
 — Miss Rosa Leo's Matinée Musicale, 3, 30, Lyric Club.
 — Messrs. Ludwig and Whitehouse's Chamber Concert, 3, Princes' Hall.
 — Mr. Lawrence Kellie's Vocal Recital, 8, Steinway Hall.
 — Mr. Sinclair Dunn's Vocal Recital, 8, Hanover Rooms.
 — M. Paderewski's Concert, 8, St. James's Hall.
 — Royal Italian Opera.
 Wed. Miss Fanny Davies's Concert, 3, Princes' Hall.
 — Mr. Arthur Friedheim's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Steinway Hall.
 — Mr. Alfred Baylis's Concert, 3, Collard & Collard's Concert Rooms.
 — Mr. J. Greenhill's Pupils' Concert, 8, Steinway Hall.
 — Miss Bertha Well's Concert, 8, St. George's Hall.
 — Hampstead Conservatoire Orchestral Concert, 8.
 — Mr. Wallworth's Vocal Concert, 8, No. 11, Harley Street.
 — Fraser Quintette's Concert, 8, 30, Princes' Hall.
 — Royal Italian Opera.
 Thurs. Mr. W. G. Cusins's Concert, 3, St. James's Hall.
 — Mr. Leopold Godowsky's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Steinway Hall.
 — Mile. Marie de Lido's Concert, 3, 30, Portman Rooms.
 — Matinée in Aid of the Hospital for Women and Children, 3, 30, Meistersingers' Club.
 — Miss Isabella Levallois's Concert, 8, Steinway Hall.
 — Royal College of Music Orchestral Concert, 8, Alexandra House.
 — Herr Felix Berber's Concert, 8, Princes' Hall.
 — Signor Bonetti's Solistic Musicale, 8, 30, Portman Rooms.
 — Royal Italian Opera.
 Fri. Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children's Concert, 3, St. James's Hall.
 — Miss Josephine Agabeg's Pupils' Concert, 3, Steinway Hall.
 — Mr. Henry Lebreton's Concert, 3, Princes' Hall.
 — Signor Rita's Concert, 3, Collard & Collard's Concert Rooms.
 — Royal Italian Opera.
 Sat. Mile. Kieselberg's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Princes' Hall.
 — Señor Sarasate's Concert, 3, St. James's Hall.
 — Miss Clara Leighton's Concert, 8, Princes' Hall.
 — Mr. Jan Mulder's Concert, 8, 30, St. James's Hall (Banqueting Room).
 — Royal Italian Opera.

DRAMA

THE WEEK.

HER MAJESTY'S.—'La Lutte pour la Vie,' en Cinq Actes et Six Tableaux. Par Alphonse Daudet.

A SEASON of French plays at Her Majesty's began on Monday with a representation by the Gymnase Company of 'La Lutte pour la Vie' of M. Daudet. That the play proved to some extent disappointing is due in part to the size of the theatre, to which, no other house being available, the choice of M. Mayer was limited. Apart from this question, however, 'La Lutte pour la Vie' is interesting rather than dramatic. One or two scenes are effective, but the action is not fused into cohesion, and the central idea, whatever its worth, calls for the elaborate processes of analysis of the novel rather than the sharp development through action of the play. On M. Daudet's treatment of so-called Darwinism it is needless to dwell. Granting all the assumptions of the dramatist, it does not follow that the man who discovers and classifies the symptoms of disease creates them. The struggle for life was as keen five generations ago as it now is, as centuries before a poet arose to point out that "Nature is one with rapine." Whatever value M. Daudet's moral possesses springs from the exhibition of features in modern existence for which Darwinism, even when misread, is no more responsible than is Buddhism or any other ism of the day. The value of M. Daudet's play is, however, apart from his theories. He shows youth ambitious, unscrupulous, selfish, cold-blooded, and aggressive, led to the verge of crime, and saved from its commission first by accident, then by death. The one restraining influence upon the civilized man is the "plastron," otherwise the shirt front of evening dress. "C'est étonnant," says Chemineau in the play, "comme le vêtement vous retape un monsieur! . . . presque de la morale, une cravate blanche." The climax of the play is reached when Madame Astier sees her husband pour into a glass the poison he carries in his pocket and offer it her. This scene is genuinely dramatic, and her address to him is most telling. She yields to his wishes, and consents to a divorce that he may not be an assassin. "Et tu le serais, tu l'es déjà! Tu as hésité une première fois, mais à la seconde tu n'hésiterais plus; et tu te ferais prendre, car on est toujours pris. . . . Et peut-être que de la tourbe immonde entourant ton supplice, une voix te crierait comme à l'autre, 'Bravo, Paul Astier!' parce que tu aurais tenu la tête droite jusque sur l'échafaud." Then follows the appeal for pardon on the part of the murderer, and its concession in the closing words of the act: "Oh moi, toujours pardon, mais c'est la vie qui ne pardonne pas. . . . Oh! sois bon, sois bon, sois honnête; tu ne sais donc pas que tout se paye, pauvre enfant, tout se paye! . . . tout!" This counsel, founded, of course, on a saying of Napoleon, constitutes the genuine moral of the story, as it is, indeed, of life in general. Failing to profit by it, Paul Astier is slain in melodramatic fashion by the father of a girl he has wronged.

The mayfly was torn by the swallow, the sparrow spear'd by the shrike,

M. Marais plays with genuine power as the hero, an ex-architect, now Under-Secretary of State, and presents with admirable sincerity the more repellent aspects. In his secretary Lortigue, who is some years younger, even more repulsive features of the "struggle for life" are presented. On his boat, as he boasts, there are no prejudices. "Un bateau où il n'y a plus rien, ni bon Dieu, ni gendarme." This character is played by M. Hirsch; and M. Noblet in his best style presents Chemineau, a third man of the time, but with a nature like that of Narcissa moderately mild. The triumph of the exposition belongs, however, to Madame Pasca, whose Madame Paul Astier is a performance of unsurpassable distinction. M. Burguet, M. Paul Plan, and Madame Desclauzas also appear in their original characters, and contribute to the strength of the cast. The only change of importance consists in the substitution of M. Devaux for M. Lafontaine in the character of Vailant, by whom the hero's life is taken.

Dramatic Gossip.

A BRILLIANT audience flocked to the Lyceum to the benefit of Miss Terry on Saturday last, and received with much applause a very emotional representation of 'Olivia.' In the farewell speech the only novelty was the announcement of the participation as musician of Dr. Mackenzie, and as painter of Mr. Seymour Lucas, in the production of Mr. Herman Merivale's adaptation of 'The Bride of Lammermoor,' with which Mr. Irving will reappear at the Lyceum in September.

THE miscellaneous performance at Drury Lane on Monday for the benefit of Mrs. Blanchard, the widow of E. L. Blanchard, included the delivery of an occasional address of Mr. Clement Scott by Miss Wallis and other actresses. Among the entertainments were 'Trying it On,' in which Mr. Wyndham appeared as Mr. Walsingham Potts, and a sketch, by Mrs. Hugh Bell, called 'A Lost Thread,' delivered by Mr. Arthur Dacre and Miss Amy Roselle.

THE production at Terry's Theatre, at an afternoon representation, of Mrs. Augusta Webster's nervously written drama of 'In a Day' only served to show that it is unfitted for stage presentation. Miss Davies Webster as the heroine showed histrionic possibilities.

A MISCELLANEOUS entertainment was given at the Criterion on Thursday afternoon. The principal feature consisted of a revival of 'Sowing and Reaping,' in which Mr. Wyndham, Miss Mary Moore, and other members of the Criterion company took part. 'Waiting,' a duologue, was given by Miss Phyllis Broughton and Mr. Monkhouse; and 'A Swamy Dansong' by Mr. Rutland Barrington and Miss Jessie Bond.

THE first recitation of 'Macbeth' by Mr. Irving and Miss Terry was received at Liverpool with great favour.

A SALE of much interest to dramatic collectors is that of the united libraries of the late F. A. Marshall and the late E. L. Blanchard, to take place at Messrs. Sotheby's in the week beginning June 30th.

NEXT WEEK'S NOVELTIES AND REVIVALS.

Mon. Her Majesty's (Evening), 'Paris Fin de Siècle.'
— Lyric (Evening), Revival of 'The Bride of Love,' by Robert Buckman.

Tues. Lyceum (Evening), Appearance of Augustin Daly's Company in 'Casting the Boomerang.'

[These announcements are subject to changes of plan on the part of managers.]

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—P. C.—J. B.—M. J.—received.
No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION BY POST.

	s.	d.
For Twelve Months	15	3
For Six Months	7	8

Ready immediately, at all the Libraries, handsomely bound in cloth gilt, crown 8vo. price 6s.

BISMARCK IN TIME.

This attractive and well-illustrated volume bristles with most interesting and characteristic anecdotes of the private life of the great ex-Chancellor.

Now ready at all the Libraries, crown 8vo. handsomely bound, cloth, 10s. 6d.

INTIMATE RECOLLECTIONS OF THE COURT OF THE TUILERIES.

THE EVE OF AN EMPIRE'S FALL.

Before the Franco-German War.

By Madame CARETTE,

Author of 'My Mistress, the Empress Eugénie.'

Third Edition, crown 8vo. handsomely bound, 6s.

Authorized Translation.

MY MISTRESS, THE EMPRESS EUGÉNIE;

Or, Court Life at the Tuileries.

By her Private Reader, Madame CARETTE (née BOUVET).

"We recommend every one who admires good work to buy and read it."—Morning Post.

Cloth gilt, crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.; post free, 2s. 8d.

STANLEY;

AND HIS HEROIC RELIEF OF EMIN PACHA.

By E. P. SCOTT.

With Map, 14 Portraits, and other Illustrations.

"Mr. E. P. Scott, himself an African traveller, gives a clear, readable, and interesting narrative of the rescue expedition, to which he has prefixed an account of Stanley's early career."—Fanny Fair.

London: Dean & Son, 100a, Fleet-street, E.C.

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO.'S
NEW BOOKS.*THE STORIES OF THE THREE BURGLARS.

By FRANK R. STOCKTON, Author of 'Rudder Grange,' 'The Hundredth Man,' &c. Crown 8vo. boards, 1s.

The First Edition was exhausted on the day of publication. Second Edition now ready.

NEW NOVELS AT ALL THE LIBRARIES.

The HOUSE on the SCAR: a Tale of South Devon. By BERTHA THOMAS, Author of 'Proud Maisie,' 'Cressida,' &c. 1 vol. crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

The WAY of TRANSGRESSORS.

By E. RENTOUL ESLEIR. 3 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, 31s. 6d.

WITH FIRE and SWORD: an Historical Novel of Poland and Russia. By HENRYK SIENKIEWICZ. Translated from the Polish by JEREMIAH CURTIN. Crown 8vo. cloth, 10s. 6d.

The CONSPIRATOR: a Romance of

Real Life. By Count PAUL P.—. Edited by FRANK HARKUT. 2 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, 21s.

"There is no lack of startling incident and sensational adventure in this record of Russian oppression and Polish intrigue.....The interest of the story seldom flags." Speaker.

NEW ADDITION TO LOW'S STANDARD NOVELS.

6s. SERIES.

SPRINGHAVEN: a Tale of the Great War. By R. D. BLACKMORE, Author of 'Lorna Doone,' &c. With numerous illustrations by Alfred Parsons and F. Barnard. Small post 8vo. cloth, 6s.

"The story is one of Mr. Blackmore's best. A fine touch of romance reveals the author of 'Lorna Doone' on almost every page."—Saturday Review.

LOW'S STANDARD NOVELS.NEW AND CHEAPER ISSUE.

Crown 8vo. fancy boards, 2s.; cloth uniform, 2s. 6d.

LORNA DOONE. By R. D. BLACKMORE.

FAR from the MADDING CROWD. By THOS. HARDY.

SENIOR PARTNER. By Mrs. RIDDELL.

CLARA VAUGHAN. By R. D. BLACKMORE.

THE GUARDIAN ANGEL. By OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

HER GREAT IDEA, and other Stories. By Mrs. WALFORD.

SOME ONE ELSE. By Mrs. CROKER.

THE MAYOR OF CASTERBRIDGE. By THOS. HARDY.

THE CASTING AWAY OF MRS. LECKS and Mrs. ALESHINE; and THE DUSANTES. By FRANK R. STOCKTON, Author of 'Rudder Grange.'

ADELA CATHART. By GEORGE MAC DONALD.

CRIPPS THE CARRIER. By R. D. BLACKMORE.

DRED. By HARRIET BECHER STOWE.

THE TRUMPET MAJOR. By THOMAS HARDY.

THE VASTY DEEP. By STUART CUMBERLAND.

DAISIES and BUTTERCUPS. By Mrs. RIDDELL.

GUILD COURT. By GEORGE MAC DONALD.

MARY ANERLEY. By R. D. BLACKMORE.

*. To be followed by others.

To meet the latest requirements of the Educational Department, and of the Educational Commission.

SAMPSON LOW'S READERS.

Edited by JOHN GILL.

(Of Cheltenham, Author of 'School Management,' &c.)

The great principle which has guided the selection of the matter is to adapt the lessons to the prevailing tastes and mental states of the successive periods in child life. Each lesson will contain a picture by some celebrated artist, as Raphael, Rubens, Turner, Landseer, or other of the world's great painters; prose, by one of the best authors; poetry, by one of the best poets; and a well-worn proverb.

Each book, while governed by the general principle regulating the series, will have one feature peculiar to itself—as, for instance, the Third Reader will introduce lessons on Nature Lore, Eastern and other Tales, Natural History, Talk and Tale of Moral Duties.

Now ready.

FIRST READER, 9d.

SECOND READER, 10d.

THIRD READER, 1s.

In the press.

FOURTH READER, 1s. 3d.

FIFTH READER, 1s. 4d.

SIXTH READER, 1s. 6d.

London:

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON, SEARLE & RIVINGTON

(LIMITED),

St. Dunstan's House, Fetter-lane, Fleet-street, E.C.

CHAPMAN & HALL'S
NEW BOOKS.*The FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW.

JUNE.

THE GREAT EQUATORIAL FOREST of AFRICA. By P. B. Du Chaillu.

THE POETRY of JOHN DONNE. By Professor Dowden.

A VISIT to a GREAT ESTATE. By Sir H. Pottinger, Bart.

DISTINCTION. By Coventry Patmore.

ON EARLY LICENSING LAWS and CUSTOMS. By J. Charles Cox, LL.D. F.S.A.

PROTECTION v. FREE TRADE in AUSTRALIA. By G. H. D. Goslip.

A GLANCE at CONTEMPORARY GREECE. By James D. Bourchier.

THE LANDLORD'S PREFERENTIAL POSITION. By R. C. Richards.

THE LATEST DISCOVERIES in HYPNOTISM.—I. By Dr. J. L. Lys.

THE LONDON STAGE:—

A Reply. By Herbert Beerbohm Tree.

A Rejoinder. By Oswald Crawford, C.M.G.

J. ADDINGTON SYMONDS.

ESSAYS, SPECULATIVE and

SUGGESTIVE. By JOHN ADDINGTON SYMONDS.

2 vols. crown 8vo. [In a few days.]

DR. WILLIAM JUNKER.

TRAVELS in AFRICA.

By DR. WILLIAM JUNKER. With 38 Full-Page Plates and 125 Illustrations in the Text. Translated from the German by Professor KEANE. Demy 8vo. [This day.]

W. S. LILLY.

ON RIGHT and WRONG.

By W. S. LILLY, Author of 'A Century of Revolution.'

Demy 8vo. 12s.

"It is not an exaggeration to say that Mr. Lilly has produced the most practically valuable contribution to ethical science which has appeared in this country for many years." Manchester Examiner.

REV. H. W. LITTLE.

H. M. STANLEY: his Life, Works, and Explorations. By the Rev. H. W. LITTLE. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d.

"Mr. Little has performed his work with considerable skill.....He knows where to emphasize and where to leave out particulars.....As a picture of Stanley and his work the book is remarkably complete and correct."—Scotsman.

F. A. BRIDGEMAN.

WINTERS in ALGERIA.

By FREDERICK ARTHUR BRIDGEMAN. With 62

Illustrations by the Author. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d.

MAJOR A. B. ELLIS.

WEST AFRICAN STORIES.

By Major A. B. ELLIS, Author of 'South African Sketches,' &c. Crown 8vo. 6s.

ALBERT D. VANDAM.

WE TWO at MONTE CARLO.

By ALBERT D. VANDAM. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 1s.

JOHN WATSON.

BRITISH SPORTING FISHES.

By JOHN WATSON. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

CHARLES DICKENS'S WORKS.

THE CROWN EDITION.

Now being published Monthly.

The Volumes contain ALL THE ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS, And the Letterpress is printed from Type expressly cast for this Edition.

Large crown 8vo. price 6s. each.

VOLUME IV. NOW READY.

DAVID COPPERFIELD.

With 40 Illustrations by Phiz.

NEW NOVEL BY H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON.

LADY FAINT HEART.

By H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON. 3 vols.

"This is a clever novel and deserves consideration. The characters are clearly and artistically drawn and prove distinct power in the clever and capable author of 'Lady Faint Heart.'"—Life.

London: CHAPMAN & HALL, LIMITED.

SATURDAY, JUNE 14, 1890.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
EDUCATION IN THE UNITED STATES	761
THE HISTORY OF THE DERBY	762
SCOTTISH RURAL LIFE	763
THE ENGLISH CLUNIAN FOUNDATIONS	763
A NEW LIFE OF HAVELOCK	763
DELITZSCH ON THE PSALMS	764
NOVELS OF THE WEEK	765
BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG	766
OUR LIBRARY TABLE—LIST OF NEW BOOKS	767-768
AMERICAN COPYRIGHT: THE 'ANTI-JACOBIN'; THE UNAUTHORIZED REPRINTING OF POEMS; THE HOSPITALERS IN ENGLAND; SALES; SUMMER PUBLISHING SEASON; WASHINGTON'S ANCESTRY	768-770
LITERARY GOSSIP	771
SCIENCE—ASTRONOMICAL LITERATURE; GEOGRAPHICAL NOTES; THE ROYAL OBSERVATORY, GREENWICH; SOCIETIES; MEETINGS; GOSSIP	773-774
FINE ARTS—PETERBOROUGH, CROWLAND, AND THORNEY; NEW PRINTS; NOTES FROM CYPRUS; SALES; GOSSIP	775-777
MUSIC—THE WEEK; GOSSIP; CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK	777-779
DRAMA—THE WEEK; GOSSIP; NEXT WEEK'S NOVELS	779-780
MISCELLANEA	780

LITERATURE

Notes on American Schools and Training Colleges. By J. G. Fitch, M.A., LL.D. (Macmillan & Co.)

Practical Hints for the Teachers of Public Schools. By George Howland. (New York, Appleton & Co.)

DR. FITCH'S small book, which is a reprint from the report of the English Education Department, may attract many readers who would not peruse the official work. It has as great interest for American as for English readers. To both it communicates the impressions of one of Her Majesty's chief inspectors of training colleges, and the impressions of Dr. Fitch are well worthy of attention. The notes are full of useful suggestions as well as of valuable information.

On each side of the Atlantic there is much misapprehension as to what is done on the other in the matter of education. Dr. Fitch gives a striking example of this in his introduction, where he quotes a passage from the Forum by Dr. E. E. Hale, in which it is said, "We spend more on public education in America than has been spent upon it in Great Britain in twenty years"; and then, after having quoted statistics in support of the statement, Dr. Hale adds, "What follows, of course, is that there are twenty times as many readers in America in the same population as there are in England." Dr. Fitch has no difficulty in showing that the conclusion is inadmissible because the premises are incorrect. In Massachusetts, with a population of less than 2,000,000, six million dollars are expended upon public education. Dr. Hale puts the expenditure in Great Britain, with a population of 35,000,000, at seventeen million dollars. The fallacy, as Dr. Fitch points out, consists in assuming that, as in Massachusetts, the State expenditure in Great Britain represents the total amount devoted to the purpose, whereas it represents that relating to elementary education only, and is, moreover, but a grant in aid of local effort. When the sum total is arrived at, it turns out to be not seventeen, but thirty-five million dollars. Moreover, education in general is more complicated in England than in America, yet, although the system in this country is wanting in symmetry, it is not, on that account, necessarily devoid of efficiency.

The difference between the two countries is best understood by those who are acquainted with the different spheres of action, as clearly set forth in Mr. Bryce's 'American Commonwealth,' of the Federal Government and the States. There is a Bureau of Education at Washington which collects and publishes statistics and documents, and does nothing more. One-sixteenth of the public lands in the States formed after 1785 has been set apart to form a school fund; but each State deals with education, as with marriage and many other matters, in the way which its legislators deem best. It is an interesting fact, noted by Dr. Fitch, that one State only has administered the public land reservation in such a way as to provide for the maintenance of the schools. Other States have sold the land and built school-houses with the proceeds, but Indiana, the home of the present President of the Union, is able to provide one million dollars from landed property, out of the one million six hundred, in round numbers, which is required to meet the school expenses.

Dr. Fitch has done well in pointing out how largely the patriotism of the American citizen is fostered by his training at school. The Americans may be prone to have too high an opinion of themselves and their country; Englishmen used to be chargeable with the same thing in the brave days of old. The flaccid minds of some modern English statesmen may be partly due to the omission on the part of their instructors in early youth to instil patriotic sentiments into their minds. The following words ought to be pondered:—

"An American boy thinks that in no other country would it be possible for him to enjoy real freedom or so many civic privileges. I was talking to a class once about the meaning of some words which were written on the board as a verbal exercise, and 'equality' being one of the words, I asked the boys to put it into a sentence. One after another made up a sentence about the equality of all American citizens, and when the question was further put, 'Equality in what?—in height, in size, in fortune, in good looks, in wisdom, in goodness?' the negative answers were followed unanimously by the phrase 'in political rights.' It was evidently the feeling of the class that such equality in political rights existed nowhere else in the world. One may be amused at this, but it is nevertheless true, on both sides of the Atlantic, that a boy is more likely hereafter to do something to make his country proud of him, if he is early taught to be proud of his country, and to have some good reasons for being proud of it."

Though American boys are taught to be patriots from their youth up, it does not follow, as is hastily assumed, that all American boys are well educated. The percentage of those who can neither read nor write is much higher than it ought to be. The statistics on this head are not compiled with so much care as others which do credit to America; nevertheless it appears that 7 per cent. even of the population of the State of Massachusetts can neither read nor write, 86 per cent. being foreign born. Other States are in as bad a plight; but the condition of Massachusetts is not materially improved by that of other States, such as Alabama, Michigan, and Arkansas. Dr. Fitch states that "in Alabama, out of a population of 1,262,505, no less than 433,447 over the age of ten were unable to write. Michigan, with a much more generous school system, had, out of a population of 1,648,600, only 63,672 illiterates; and Arkansas, out of a population of 1,542,359, had 410,722."

The rules and regulations in American schools are minute and exacting to the verge of pedantry. American children and their teachers are ready to protest against doing anything which is above or below their "grade." The system of tuition is measured with mechanical exactness, and the teachers have little, if any, opportunity for developing the capacity of their pupils. Those who know the appointed lessons are credited with possessing talent; those who, though intelligent, are yet unable to do the routine work of the school, are pronounced dunces. There is a greater drawback still, whether it flow from the former one or be independent of it, and it can be set forth to the best advantage in Dr. Fitch's own words:

"Text-books and certain accepted formulas appeared to diminish the work of the classes too much, and, in spite of the undoubted merits of some features of the educational system, I have not the least reason to believe that American boys and girls are more soundly taught or are provided with a better intellectual outfit for the business and duties of life than English children of the same age, who are brought up in a good elementary school."

It is gratifying to learn, on such an unimpeachable authority as Dr. Fitch, that though the systems of education may differ on both sides of the Atlantic, the results on both sides are satisfactory. America has the negative advantage of freedom from sectarian strife and jealousy and all their hideous consequences, and a positive one in "the universal interest in education shown by the whole community in America." The wisest words on the subject which have been written of late years are contained in many paragraphs of Dr. Fitch's small book. Many points of detail are indicated as well worthy of adoption. Dr. Fitch has an unbiassed mind—a qualification which is as rare as it is useful in dealing with the subjects upon which he pronounces judgment. Every English teacher and every one who has any control over education should read what he has written, and if Americans also read it they will not regret doing so. Not the least deserving of reflection are the following pithy sentences with which this instructive book closes:—

"Every American has at his command vast and undeveloped material resources. He is conscious, in himself and in his countrymen, of ambition and enthusiasm, of the ability to surmount difficulties, and of yet unused intellectual strength. His golden age lies in the future, not in the past. He does not indulge in the Englishman's habit of self-depreciation. He never falls into the mood in which his English cousin is often fain to disparage the institutions of his own country, and to assume that educational and other work is better done by foreigners than by himself. He believes that Englishmen are only half sincere when they use such language. But if he is sometimes boastful, it is because he feels secure in the conviction that he can justify his boasts. He is aware of the many defects in his own educational system, especially its frequent lack of thoroughness, and he is very sensible of the need for amendment. But he is not disheartened, for in the first place he believes he is fully able to effect improvement, and in the second place he means to do it."

The "public schools" of the United States differ in so many practical details from corresponding institutions in this country that Mr. Howland's 'Practical Hints' will not be found of great service to English teachers. In spite, however, of all difference in organization and scope between American and English schools, the principles underlying the art of teaching and the personal qualities ensuring success in its practice are the same for all countries; the results, therefore, of Mr. Howland's experience and thought will be found more or less useful to those interested in the progress of public education. But we are compelled, after a careful perusal of these 'Practical Hints,' to state that they contain nothing that is not already contained in numerous manuals of education, and very little that is not more tersely and elegantly expressed elsewhere. Education is a subject one would have expected to find discussed even by its enthusiastic advocates in a calm, rigorous style, disfigured neither by rant nor inaccuracy; whereas Mr. Howland finds numerous opportunities of working himself into something akin to hysterics, and then penning passages of which the sound is out of all proportion to the sense. The preface offers some excuse for this: "The several chapters of this volume comprise a series of papers read before the teachers of the public schools of Chicago and vicinity, and were prepared with no thought of publication." As lectures the chapters may have been tolerable or even stimulating; but when publication was decided upon, Mr. Howland, or at any rate Dr. W. T. Harris, who edits the "International Education Series," should have taken some pains to adapt the lectures to the taste and needs of educated people. One curious impression left on the mind after the reading of the volume under consideration is that Transatlantic scholars and teachers live in a lachrymose and hysterical condition. This impression is surely misleading, for these persons in real life seem singularly bright and self-reliant. Mr. Howland, however, assures us that the little six-year-old who will presently go to school "turns tearfully away" from watching his elder companions answer the summons of the school-bell, simply because he cannot yet accompany them; and we also find that a school teacher who has received a word of advice from the superintendent waters it with tears. We willingly admit that Mr. Howland must know the people, young and old, under his superintendence better than we can possibly do, but this faculty of ready tears surprises us.

The chapter devoted to the work of the school superintendent is the one that will best repay perusal, and scattered throughout the entire volume are sound thoughts and well-founded opinions which teachers on both sides of the Atlantic may do well to think over and act upon; but it cannot honestly be said that they are so numerous or so valuable as to ensure to the volume of 200 pages in which they are concealed an extensive circulation.

The Blue Ribbon of the Turf. By Louis Henry Curzon. (Chatto & Windus.)

THIS is not a romance after the fashion of Mr. Hawley Smart, but a volume consisting partly of dissertation and partly of compilation. The reason why it was put together and published is explained by the author in a modest, deprecatory sort of preface. He expected, it appears, that when the hundredth anniversary of "the Derby" (which, as we all know, was pronounced by the late Lord Beaconsfield, with a little confusion of terms, to be "the blue ribbon of the turf") came round, the opportunity would not be allowed to slip by, but that a history of the great race which has been run annually at Epsom since 1780 (the first year of running) would be issued at once for the gratification of those who might be tolerably familiar with the records of a famous British institution and for the enlightenment of the outside public, who, though accustomed to hear it spoken of, and themselves to speak of it from time to time, would cut a very poor figure indeed if they were to be put through an examination upon its origin, progress, mutations, and various details. To his astonishment, his expectation was unfulfilled; the centenary of "the Derby" was allowed to pass without any attempt to glorify it on the part of acknowledged historians. Bishop Stubbs, Prof. Freeman, and Mr. Froude made no sign; and the writer therefore determined to undertake the task himself.

How long he waited before he set seriously to work to supply what he evidently considered a national want he does not say. But it is about ten years since he must have begun to feel horror-stricken at the sight of the conspicuous neglectfulness of historians; and if he commenced his labours at once, all that can be said, in view of the results attained, is that he must have taken his time over them, and, to use a phrase appropriate to his subject, did not "bustle" himself. But it is more likely, to judge from the self-depreciative tone which he adopts, that he waited and waited for others to anticipate him, until hope deferred made his heart grow sick; and then, notwithstanding the love with which, he tells us, and we can readily believe, he accomplished his purpose, he put pressure upon himself to be ready with his book whilst this year's Summer Meeting at Epsom was still to be reckoned among the events of the future. Otherwise, had he taken all those ten years for preparation, one cannot help thinking that his history would have reminded one a little less of a skeleton, and that his "Chronicle of the Derby, from Diomed [1780] to Donovan [1889]," would have been less like a mere transcript of Orton's 'Annals' from 1780 to 1843, and from 1844 to 1890 of the Racing Calendar. He would also probably have arranged certain matters a little more methodically. For instance, he might have made more prominent the various changes which have taken place in the day of running, in the distance run, in the weights carried, in the month of incidence (whether May or June, together with an explanation of "the reason why"), in the course adopted (varying as to the starting-place), and so on. It is true that they all, or nearly all, receive due mention; but the information is so scattered through the volume as to make a search for it troublesome. Nevertheless, both in his "Chronicle" and in other portions of his volume, the compiler makes it quite evident that he has been a diligent gleaner among newspapers, magazines, and books appertaining to his subject; and he has evidently had a long personal experience, which enables him to write with considerable knowledge and authority about matters connected certainly (and unhappily) with horse-racing, but not more with "the blue ribbon of the turf" than with the paltry events decided many years ago at those odious suburban meetings which were put a stop to by Act of Parliament, not—as they should have been—by the action of the Jockey Club, in whose power it lay to suppress them by refusing to advertise their programmes in the Calendar, or to acknowledge the qualification of horses that ran at them.

On the whole, then, the volume may be said to contain among its pages quite as much as it is necessary for anybody to know about the Derby, and more, perhaps, than is to be found in any other single publication, as well as more than most people will care to trouble their memories with.

The copy which is here under consideration is especially noticeable from the fact that a whole sheet (of sixteen pages, from p. 129 to p. 144) has been omitted, and its place supplied by the repetition of pp. 81-96, so that a certain amount of information or observation has been lost entirely. The loss may be irreparable, for the pages may have contained an invaluable "tip," and it is small consolation to know that some other copy contains that "tip" accentuated by iteration. For either that other copy may never have been issued up to this moment, or may have fallen into the hands of some undeserving person or of some ignoramus incapable of profiting by the double good fortune.

As regards the author and compiler, his name, whether real or assumed, is an excellent one to stand upon the title-page of such a work; for among the original members of the Jockey Club was Mr. (afterwards Sir Nathaniel) Curzon, a famous owner, runner, and rider of racehorses, who was created of the peerage by the title of Lord Scarsdale (Baron) in 1761; and in respect of the author's credentials as a person who has reached years of discretion and who commenced early his acquaintance with the affairs of the turf, it may be inferred from his own pages that he is about sixty-six years old, that he began to evince an interest in the Derby when he had attained only six of them, and had half-a-crown in a "Derby sweep" when he had passed some thirteen or fourteen of them. This makes it the more remarkable that here and there he should be so very unsatisfactory. For example, he tells (p. 49) the anecdote concerning Lord Grosvenor, Lord Abingdon, and Mr. Elwes (the miser) according to Mr. Whyte's version ('History of the British Turf'), which is quite erroneous; and he (by a misprint, or rather omission, no doubt) renders the errors still worse by representing that Gimcrack, foaled in 1760 and put to the stud in 1771, ran a match with Cardinal York (foaled 1775) in 1779. The match was between Cardinal York and a filly by Dux (not, as Mr. Whyte has it, a colt by Gimcrack), which filly was afterwards appropriately called Misfortune, but, nevertheless, became the dam of the celebrated horse Buzzard by Woodpecker; and it was Lord Abingdon, not

Lord Grosvenor, to whom the sport-loving miser is said to have lent, unasked and without bond, the 3,000 guineas without which Lord Abingdon would have had to forfeit. So, at least, stands the story in Pick and elsewhere; and what makes this version the more truthlike is that Elwes and Abingdon were neighbours in Berkshire. At any rate, there is no doubt that the match was between Cardinal York and the filly afterwards called (by way of commemoration) Misfortune. Then, again, at p. 232 it is stated that "Eclipse was bred by his Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland, who ran horses in the Derby of 1781, 1782, and 1783"; but the breeder of Eclipse was the "Culloden" duke, who died in 1765, and at whose death his horses were sold, so that Eclipse came into the hands of Wildman and O'Kelly. The duke who ran horses for these Derbies was, of course, "the silly boy who disgraced the title," as we read in the letters of the day. Moreover, as to the name of the filly which won the Oaks in 1796, we find it given as Parasite (p. 41), and both Parasote and Parisot (p. 254), the last (= pari-sot = sot pari = stupid bet, no doubt, as her dam was Deceit and her granddam Perdita) being correct. Again, the suicide of poor Mr. Berkeley Craven in "Bay Middleton's year" (1836) is said (pp. 225-6) to be the "first Derby suicide that is recorded, so far as is known to the writer"; but the writer's friend Mr. Whyte would have told him (vol. ii. p. 132) how "one unfortunate 'better,' Mr. Robert Brograve, having lost upwards of 8,000*l.* at Epsom, by backing the field against Smolensko, and being unable to pay his bets, shot himself..... though he had 4,000*l.* in the hands of his bankers."

And that was as early as 1813. But, of course, such errors will abound in works full of detail, and must be weighed against the heavier mass of useful and laboriously culled information.

In Scottish Fields. By Hugh Haliburton. (Paterson & Co.)

MR. HALIBURTON is much in his element in 'Scottish Fields.' His essays have certainly been thought out in Scottish fields; and his thorough knowledge of rustic Scotland, as well as of the old makkars, makes him a valuable expounder of the influences which went to make Burns. The descriptions he supplies of the life of the old-fashioned Scottish ploughman bear the mark of truth, and his observations on the revolution which has taken place in rural districts will commend themselves to many persons' experience:—

"The other day I stopped on the high-road to chat with a stonebreaker who was smoking beside his bing. A deserted and utterly decayed farm-town of the smaller class was in view. 'Very few folk,' he said, 'ken the name of that auld toon. But I was a laddie there fifty years syne, livin' with my faither. That's Buchtleya. It's pairt o' a big farm, and has nae name noo. My faither had a pair o' horses and sax kye, forby sheep, on that bit place; and in that hoose my foure sisters were trained to service by their mither. I wonder where the gentry get their hoose servants noo. For myself I was a kin' o' wastrel; tried Glesca; ran aft to America; an' here I am, knappin' stanes within sicht o' my faither's hoose. It was a couthier hame than I've kent since I left it: at least it was a happier. An' Scotland was a heartier kintra to live in.'"

The same testimony comes from all sides. "There's nae body but auld folk and single folk" in the deserted village. The system of large farms and the attractions of the towns have depopulated the country, and the hearty life amid which the last of the makkars grew up is now impossible.

Of those who lived before Agamemnon, Mr. Haliburton has an excellent knowledge, and his sympathetic criticism does full justice to the development of the master of Scottish song. Especially in recalling the exceeding merits of Dunbar, the Burns of the beginning of the sixteenth century, has he done good literary service. There is surely something more than a coincidence in the existence of "the first Dr. Hornbook," as Mr. Haliburton calls the object of Dunbar's satire. Perhaps we might even note, in connexion with 'Auld Lang Syne,' a good Scots phrase of Dunbar's, "They wauchtit at the wicht wine." It is just possible that Burns may to some extent have entered into the labours of Dunbar as well as of Fergusson and Ramsay. Certainly nothing is truer than that Burns was an historical development, "the bright consummate flower" of a perfectly natural and organic national growth."

For Dunbar, of whom a few (too few) specimens are given, he requires, as our author says, "to be reintroduced." Why should not Mr. Haliburton perform the ceremony? He has the perfervid "ingyne" of him who wrote, "In field go furth and fend the laif"; not a little of the humour of him who sang a psalm to "my ain Lord Thesaurair," and lamented "my paneiful purs so prikillis me"; and we fancy not a little of the pathos of him who, thinking of "that sweit meik Rois," was ever so earnest in his loyal expostulations.

Visitations of English Cluniac Foundations. By Sir G. F. Duckett, Bart. (Kegan Paul & Co.)

SIR GEORGE DUCKETT, who has done so much to introduce the records of Cluny to the notice of English readers, has dealt in this brochure with some documents of unusual interest. Thanks to the efforts of Father Gasquet, Dr. Jessopp, and others, greater attention is now being paid to the evidence of monastic visitations. Much yet remains to be done in rendering such evidence accessible, and Sir George Duckett's contributions to our knowledge are, therefore, most welcome.

The three visitations here translated are those of 1262, 1275-6, and 1279; and to these has been added a record containing notes on the Cluniac foundations in England and Scotland, based, in the opinion of Sir George, on visitation reports of 1298, 1390, and 1405.

The most striking feature of all these reports is their tone of frankness and fairness. Amidst the jangle of testimony, condemnatory and the reverse, adduced by polemic students writing with a parti pris, it is refreshing to meet with the witness of those who have no case to establish, and who record with equal fidelity the good and the bad. Of itself this gives one confidence in their reports, when one finds them reflecting, in their light and shade, the varying qualities of human nature.

The matters into which the visitors inquired may be broadly divided into two classes, the spiritual and the temporal. The former comprised the due performance of the established offices, the character of the inmates of the house, and especially of its head; the latter included all details relating to the management of the conventual estate and a close inquiry into indebtedness. Much might be written by a critical editor on the material contained in these reports. For instance, the visitors—they were always two, one of them an English and one a foreign dignitary of the Order—were far more difficult to satisfy in 1275-6 than in 1262. Yet the English visitor of 1275-6, John, Prior of Wenlock, was himself most severely criticized in the reports of 1279. He was charged with leaving the affairs of his previous house, St. Andrew of Northampton, in a most embarrassed condition, and with being "guilty of gross fraud" with respect to those of Wenlock. "He sells and alienates," the visitors complain, "whatever he possibly can"; and one of them—the foreigner, we presume—accuses his subordinates of complicity, declaring that "it is almost impossible to elicit the truth from English monks." The same spirit of national jealousy is manifest in the naïf and astounding remark that another prior "is a good man, and, although an Englishman, humble, sensible, and discreet." The case of the Priory of Monk Bretton, where the visitors in 1279 were actually refused admission, and had recourse to the extreme step of excommunicating the inmates, is significant of the intense dislike of Englishmen to these inquisitorial visitations, necessary though they were. We think, however, that Sir George Duckett has assumed too hastily that Lewes Priory refused admission to the visitors in 1275-6, an assertion unsupported by evidence.

The general condition of the Cluniac houses appears to have been satisfactory from the moral and spiritual standpoint, especially in the larger foundations. The visitors spoke plainly when the reverse was the case. In one instance a prior and his colleague lead "an immoral and incontinent life.... The divine offices are not only totally neglected, but the goods of the church are, for the most part, dissipated and alienated." Mismanagement of estates and a tendency to run into debt are the matters chiefly complained of, and most difficult to check. We have said enough to illustrate the interest of these reports. Many, we fear, will regret that they appear in a free translation only. Sir George's rendering, doubtless, is trustworthy in the main, but why does he translate the familiar "Advocatus" by "avoué" on pp. 34, 35, while rightly giving it as "patron" on p. 19?

Havelock. By Archibald Forbes. (Macmillan & Co.)

THE theme of the latest contribution to the "English Men of Action" series is interesting, but the subject has scarcely been dealt with in a thoroughly satisfactory manner. The book should, to our thinking, have been an essay bringing out the personality of the man and examining the claims which Havelock possessed to be enrolled among the foremost of England's generals. Mr. Forbes has taken another view of his task, for he has produced little more than a bare sketch of his hero's career, which was not particularly interesting until he assumed command of the force destined to relieve the garrison of the Lucknow Residency), and has devoted but a comparatively small space to the only exciting chapter of his life, while the verbal portrait of Havelock is somewhat indistinct.

There was nothing remarkable in the boyhood and youth of Havelock. The son of a retired shipbuilder at Sunderland, he was educated at Charterhouse, on leaving which he was entered at the Middle Temple, and became a pupil of the celebrated Chitty, in 1813, at the age of eighteen. His father having fallen into financial embarrassments, all ideas of the bar were perforce abandoned, and in 1815 Henry Havelock, through the interest of his elder brother William, who had won distinction both in the Peninsula and at Waterloo, obtained a commission in the old 95th, now the Rifle Brigade. The next seven years he spent at various home stations, employing his leisure in the assiduous study of the best available books on the art of war. This love of military literature lasted all his life, and the writer of this review was told by an officer now dead that whenever during the siege of Jellalabad he went to Havelock's quarters, he was certain to find him poring over either the Bible or Jomini. There being no prospect of war in Europe, Havelock exchanged in 1822 into the 13th Light Infantry, then serving in the Bengal Presidency. He in 1829 married the daughter of a Baptist missionary at Serampore, and soon after he became a Baptist himself. In a way his military career was unprosperous; for although he took part with distinction in the first Burmese war, the first Afghan war, the Gwalior campaign, and the first Sikh war, it was not till the Persian war in 1856-1857 that he obtained a command in the field, and it was not till he succeeded in reinforcing the Lucknow garrison that he became a major-general. On the other hand, he held a succession of good staff appointments, and did little regimental duty. Moreover, as Mr. Forbes points out, his stationary position was due partly to the fact that he was not a purchase officer, and that he constantly exchanged, going, of course, to the bottom of his rank on each occasion. Also, as a matter of fact, his promotion was not extraordinarily slow; many officers of ability and distinction served longer than he did before attaining the rank of major-general. He was not exceptionally unlucky, nor had he any right to grumble at his slow advancement. The authorities were not to blame because, though he was ever conscious of his own merits, they had no opportunity of discovering them. There is no doubt that he carried out the reinforcement of Lucknow with remarkable skill and energy; and as soon as he had accomplished even a portion of the difficult task, the stream of reward began to flow with a full volume. That most of the credit of the feats accomplished was centred on the leader was not Havelock's fault, for in his somewhat pedantic, grandiloquent style he was always holding forth in addresses, in general orders, and in despatches on the merits of his troops. They did not quite—at all events, the Highlanders of the 78th did not—appreciate his somewhat strutting gait and stilted talk, but they soon gained confidence in his skill and soldierly qualities, a confidence which remained unshaken to the last. Magnificent instruments in his hand were they indeed; no odds could appal them, no fatigues weaken their determination, no privations quench their warlike ardour; and the very first action, viz., that of Futtehpore, proved their metal to be of the highest quality, for in less than thirty-six hours the troops marched thirty-five miles under a burning sun, and won a hard-fought battle. Their subsequent performances showed no falling off in courage and endurance.

Troops and commander were, indeed, each the complement of the other. With soldiers of a less fine quality the commander could not have accomplished the almost superhuman task entrusted to him. With a commander less resolute and skilful even that splendid body of soldiers would have hazarded their lives to no purpose. The honour, therefore, cannot be divided, and he who would attribute all to Havelock is ignorant of war. It has been said that an army of asses led by a lion is better than an army of lions led by an ass. In this case it was an army of lions led by a lion.

Biblical Commentary on the Psalms. By Franz Delitzsch, D.D. From the Latest Edition specially revised by the Author. Translated by the Rev. David Eaton, M.A. 3 vols. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

THE late Prof. Delitzsch devoted many years of study to the Psalms. The first edition of his commentary appeared in 1859-60, and the present is the fourth. Students may complain of its length, but when they think of Venema's six quartos, or of the four octavo volumes which Hupfeld and Hengstenberg each thought necessary, the complaint may seem unjust. The present work, spread over 1,500 pages, a hundred of which are occupied with an introduction, looks undoubtedly formidable to those who think of mastering it. All will observe at once that great attention is given to the strophes and accents of the text, that the opinions of the principal Jewish commentators are noted, and that the Talmud is not neglected. The author compares Hebrew words with cognate Arabic and Syriac ones—occasionally, too, with the Assyrian, by the help of his son; he carefully explains grammatical peculiarities, while the tenses of verbs, that puzzling subject, the prepositions and particles are duly attended to. In short, the learned writer enters minutely into all textual matters. The prevalence of the names Jahve and Elohim is noted, and he usually retains these words in the translation, although their juxtaposition is sometimes awkward, as in lxi. 14, where we read:—

But as for me, I pray unto Thee, Jahve, in a time of favour, Elohim, through Thy great grace.

A student perusing a few pages and seeing all the peculiarities of textual elucidation will naturally feel confidence in a scholar whose ripe knowledge of Hebrew and of Holy Scripture comes into prominence at every step. Long familiarity with the original Hebrew gave Dr. Delitzsch a title to speak with authority, though he was not of a dogmatic disposition. And let it be said to his praise that he did not stereotype his views on Biblical matters, but learned and changed. It need not be said that he was master of the most important literature connected with the Psalms, and even possessed a considerable, though naturally incomplete, knowledge of English writers on the subject. As far as we have observed he was unacquainted with the works of Lowe and Jennings, Kay, Phillips, Thrupp, and others. He assumed that there are no Maccabæan Psalms, though he thought they are "possible," avoiding Hitzig's extreme opinion; he believed that Elohim never means angels, and adopted Gesenius's view of the meaning of "psalms of degrees." The translation is literal, much more accurate than the Authorized or the Revised Version, and retains the order of the original as far as possible. We can only give the first nine verses of Psalm xc.: Lord, Thou hast been unto us a place of refuge in all generations!

Before the mountains were born
And the earth and the world were brought forth,
Even from æon to æon Thou art God!
Thou turnest mortals to dust,
And sayest: Return, ye children of men.
For a thousand years are in Thine eyes
As yesterday, when it is passing,
And a watch in the night.
Thou floodest them away; they become a sleep;
In the morning they sprout up again like grass.
In the morning it blossometh and sprouteth up again;
In the evening they cut it down, and it withereth.
For we are wasted away through Thine anger;
And through Thy wrath are we scared away.
Thou hast set our iniquities before Thee,
Our most secret matter in the bright light of Thy countenance.

For all our days have passed away in Thy wrath;
We have finished our years as a murmur.

This is susceptible of some slight amendment. "A murmur" is incorrect; the original means a thought.

The professor's bias was conservative. He attached weight to the titles, and assigned more Psalms to David than he need have done. In like manner his Messianic odes and parts of them are unnecessarily multiplied. The quotations in the New Testament are accepted in the sense there given to the originals. Bringing the Psalms as much as possible into connexion with the history of redemption in the New Testament, or, in his own words, believing that "the history of Israel culminates and is recapitulated in the history of Christ," he assumes typical persons, especially David and kings of his dynasty, and this theory leads to the adoption in effect, though not in plain words, of a double sense or reference—one a partial, the other a complete fulfilment. The commentary exhibits also an inclination to Rabbinic "Spitzfindigkeit," and a theosophic bias which imports a foreign element into the meaning of the sacred writers. The author was ingenious as well as learned, and his ingenuity easily suggested artificial comments.

Is it accidental that the commentator occasionally hesitates and employs language at variance with plain statements elsewhere?

Although he says in another part that Elohim does not mean angels, his words on Psalm viii. 6 are, "It is really possible that David thought not only of God, but also of the angels"; and therefore he translates "had made him little less than divine." In the same way, when explaining xi. 8, after affirming that the meaning of a vision of God is not that beyond the grave, he adds, "As little can it be said that it is exclusively a vision on this side of it." Such exposition lacks firmness.

The professor was not free from curious fancies, as appears from his distribution of Psalm cxviii., which he supposed to be a festal hymn at the dedication of the new Temple, and divided in an unnatural way. Psalm xxiv. is split up in a similar way. The exposition of Psalm xlv. is both defective and erroneous. According to Prof. Delitzsch the original sense is not the prophetic Messianic; yet he asserts that the poet was justified in regarding Jehoram (the assumed subject of it) in the light of the Messianic idea. The eighth verse is wrongly translated. Elohim is not a vocative, for the appellation is never applied to one king, certainly not to a king who was tyrannical and idolatrous. The professor misapprehends the character of Psalm xlv. in calling it "a fugitive" one; it is an epithalamium or nuptial ode on the marriage of some Hebrew king.

Psalm lxxiii., which presents several difficulties, does not always receive an exact translation or exposition. The twenty-fourth verse, indeed, is correctly translated; and 122 of the fifteenth receives the explanation given by Gesenius; but to make the twenty-first and twenty-second verses the protasis, and the next the apodosis, is a doubtful measure. "Rid Thyself of" (verse 20) is incorrect, as is also "dreadful calamities" (verse 19). At Psalm cxxii. 6, where the ark is spoken of, the meanings assigned to "Ephrathah" and "the fields of the wood" are far-fetched and unnatural. Another artificial explanation is to be found in Psalm cxxxi., where Dr. Delitzsch attempts to show the propriety of making the dew of Hermon trickle down upon the mountains of Zion.

No better specimen of the professor's peculiar mode of interpretation can be found than his treatment of Psalm cx., whose author he takes to be David, speaking of Christ "directly and objectively." The ode is pronounced "future-historical upon a typical background."

With all its imperfections the commentary has great intrinsic value, being the work of an able scholar and excellent Hebraist. In some respects it supplements and corrects the admirable volumes of Hupfeld, exposing and opposing his speculations about authorship and date.

NOVELS OF THE WEEK.

The Rajah's Heir. 3 vols. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

Blindfold. By Miss Florence Marryat. 3 vols. (White & Co.)

A Mariage de Convenance. By C. F. Keary. 2 vols. (Fisher Unwin.)

With Essex in Ireland. By the Hon. Emily Lawless. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

Jacquetta. By S. Baring-Gould. (Methuen & Co.)

A Resolute Purpose. By Katharine Ashburner. (Bristol, Arrowsmith.)

The Mystery of a Millionaire's Grave. By Gordon - Stables, M.D., C.M., R.N. (Remington & Co.)

The Man from Manchester. By Dick Donovan. (Chatto & Windus.)

TALES of the Indian Mutiny always seem rather out of date nowadays, though there are people who allege that they are never tired of the motive in fiction. 'The Rajah's Heir' should interest these, and may also interest old Indians who have their personal recollections of the awful experiences of the time, and like to see how various novelists handle them. The present nameless author (who may possibly have been a political agent or resident for the Government, though there is no great evidence of this either) knows a good deal about the time and the then existing conditions of India, though not, perhaps, much more than is now historical and common property. For the rest imagination is largely drawn upon, and, in places, has rather impoverished than added to the interest of the descriptions. At the beginning one is inclined to believe that the thing is going to be a fantastic romance leaning to the supernatural, but it presently develops into a story of the Mutiny pure and simple, with, of course, a number of fictitious persons and episodes intermixed with well-known facts and circumstances. The awful suspicion and uncertainty which weighed so cruelly on British minds, and replaced the false security and trust with which they had come to regard the native troops, are well given; the other side of the picture is also well suggested. But the book seems to be spun out too far, and there are so many people introduced that the dramatic effect is greatly weakened. In its way it is interesting, however, and to some extent worth reading.

Novel-readers who like their amusements "mixed," and the impossible and prosaic made one, may enjoy 'Blindfold.' Events occur in it that are, to say the least, outside the range of common experience, and yet cannot be called vividly imaginative flights either. One thing will not surprise the constant reader of Miss Marryat, and that is the presence of the voluptuous-looking young woman with the ripe lips and all the rest of the physical and moral equipment. She is a part of Miss Marryat's literary "properties," and without her the machinery might refuse to act. The incidents (we had almost said the absurdities) of the story do not hang so well together as even absurdities should, and there is a general impression that whoever or whatever may turn up matters not so long as the thing is kept going; and it does go somehow, for a volume at least. After that two more volumes seem over much. The life in Australia is the best bit. When that is over a hypnotic lady steals upon the scenes, always in a trance or just going in or coming out of one, which is dullish work. She is the innocent cause of anguish to herself and her friends (not to the callous reader) by helping to precipitate her stalwart bridegroom over a precipice in the Alps.

'A Mariage de Convenance' is a novel in the form of letters. It is not an easy style in which really to succeed, demanding as it does sundry peculiar and by no means common qualities. But a certain surface facility in the presentation of the characters and circumstances is sometimes gained, as in the present instance. The unfortunate marriage does not seem to have turned out badly because of its being a marriage of convenience, but because of the peculiar temperament and idiosyncrasies of the husband, who, like Madame de Staël's Oswald (only without his stateliness), "could not decide on one fate, however good, without regretting another"—a character eminently unfitted to make for matrimonial righteousness. The story is well enough told, nor is it wanting in vivacity, but there is a lack of strength and certainty in the matter of effects, and the want of any dominant note makes of it a somewhat vague performance.

The dreary struggles of England and Ireland in our own day appear to afford so much material to writers of fiction, that comparatively few have sought for subjects among the bloodstained pages of the past. And yet the past history is as much more dramatic as it is more tragic than the present, treason being more romantic when the rebel is a lord who stakes his head than when he is a journalist who risks the more prosaic penalty of imprisonment. Morally, the rebel leaders of Elizabethan Ireland may have been inferior to the leaders of our day, but a man who fights for a time-honoured supremacy is more interesting than one struggling to revive a half-forgotten past: in the eyes of the outsider the one is fighting for a substance, the other for a shadow, and therefore Tyrone, who was full, not merely of human frailties, but of very ugly faults, is a more picturesque figure than the most immaculate Parnellite M.P. The aims of the latter may be purer and as worthy, but he is not fighting even nominally for his faith, and what is more, there is no probability that his head will adorn the Tower of London, or his bones whiten in chains above the walls of Dublin Castle. In Miss Lawless's story the narrator of what befell Essex in Ireland found the walls of Dublin liberally adorned with quarters, bones, and heads of rebels, but, unlike the more humane of his contemporaries, he found no horror in the sight, and the inartistic disposal of them in front of the windows instead of merely over the gates appears to him nothing more than "a foolish, and even a somewhat barbarous and unhandsome custom." Indeed, Miss Lawless has exercised laudable self-restraint in her choice of a narrator, Henry Harvey, the secretary of Essex, being in no respect better, and in some ways less manly, than the average gentleman of his age. His is a type of character dear to writers of romance—crabbed, self-satisfied, pedantic, vain with the overweening vanity of the poetaster, full of rhymes, but destitute of poetic thoughts. Such as he is, he draws himself excellently in her pages, although the exigencies of the narrative force him at times to express himself with a degree of literary grace that more properly belongs to Essex, who is the hero of the tale. When Harvey and Essex discourse together, Essex takes the enlightened rôle; pity and sympathy are his part, while Harvey displays the spirit that made it possible for men to torture and mutilate and flay their fellow men for being worsted in a fair stand-up fight. It was a cruel age, and Mr. Secretary Harvey's bloodstained pages do not record a tithe of the dreadful sights he must have seen. He retails one or two horrors as specimens, and many touching incidents he relates effectively enough; for example, there is the charming picture of Mistress Bridget Burke standing upon the castle wall that her imprisoned lover may see her shadow from his dungeon window. Then, too, there is the death of the gallant lad Frank Gardner, the widow's only son, who had insisted on joining his neighbour Harvey and serving in the Irish war. He is one of the first of the ill-fated expedition to perish; mortally wounded, he lingers delirious a few hours, and then dies miserably on a heap of cloaks under the shelter of a tent. His sufferings end painlessly thus:—

"While I stood there, leaning over him, it happened that there came a rushing noise of wind without, so that the leaves of the forest were ruffled, and brushed one against another, making a soft noise like the sound of a woman's dress creeping cautiously along the ground and coming nearer. At that sound Frank Gardner suddenly opened his eyes, and a smile broke over his face, such a smile as one sees upon the face of a little child which has cried itself to sleep, when it wakes suddenly at night and sees one whom it loves bending over it. And, half lifting his head, he turned his cheek round, as though expecting some one would lay a kiss upon it (which indeed was fair and smooth still as a maiden's), and with a great sigh full of comfort and satisfaction—'Mother,' said he very tenderly, and with that word still upon his lips his spirit departed to God who made it."

Thus does Harvey (who can see sackfuls of rebel heads unmoved) recount the death of his friend, whom the reader may possibly be inclined to take at the narrator's valuation as one that would have done great things "had he in God's grace lived to be a man, and grown beyond his nonage." With the hero it is otherwise; Essex is perfect in the eyes of his secretary, who sees in him neither weakness, nor peevishness, nor imprudence; but here Harvey produces less illusion. We feel his estimate of Essex mistaken, though we like him better for his generous misjudgment. This situation is admirably given; with considerable skill the author produces the desired effect—that neither Ireland nor Essex were as Harvey saw them, but that he was absolutely sincere in what he wrote. There is, of course, no plot, nor any female interest; the book is merely the record of Essex's Irish administration in fancy dress; but the incidents are numerous, romantic, and novel, the narrative is lively, and the diction quaint enough to heighten the illusion to the novel-reading public, though to the student this will probably appear the least successful detail of a successful effort.

The reprints from the Cornhill and the English Illustrated Magazine by Mr. Baring-Gould comprise three tales of some merit. 'The Story of Jael' pertains to the flats of Essex, Brightlingsea and Wyvenhoe; and the dark impassioned peasant heroine deserves a better fate than she meets. Slight as are the sketches of the hard but loving father and the hide-bound stepmother who drive her to despair, they sufficiently represent lifelike, but unlovely types of our modern Arcadians. Jael has a nobler strain in her, and in her passion she has nothing coarse, in her despair nothing cruel. The other bank of the river is the scene of a different catastrophe. The Kentish coquette of Darenth Wood is an absolute contrast to the single-hearted Jael; but she too is a striking picture of a girl morally superior to her surroundings, a dangerous pre-eminence in her class of life. The principal story, 'Jacquetta,' is a clever though rather farcical comparison of French and English "modes of thought."

The author of 'A Resolute Purpose' would seem to have copied her hero from a type with which the readers of Miss Yonge's stories are sufficiently familiar. The father and mother of a young and promising family die early and bequeath the family cares to the eldest son, who generally sacrifices himself on the altar of brotherly affection in a manner beautiful to behold. But we doubt whether even Miss Yonge's paragons can compete with Fairfax Towerscourt in priggish excellence. It would almost appear that the author herself has her doubts as to the reality of her characters, for on the last page she remarks: "It may not be fair, perhaps, to criticize the actions of any members of so peculiar a family as the Towerscourts as severely as those of their neighbours"—though if peculiarity exempts from criticism there is no reason why the neighbours should not escape also. The Towerscourts, by the medium of an epileptic brother, and "many a deed and parchment crusted with ancient dust," discover that insanity is hereditary in their family, and make the sensible resolution that they will not marry—hence the "resolute purpose." The story is told with much babbling irrelevance and in a sickly strain of sentiment that is mawkish in the extreme. People are referred to by the most terrible pet names: "Old Brother," "Little Mother," "Boy," "Sweet Honey," and "Magnum Bonum." The last-named is a German doctor, beautiful, fair-haired, and musical, with the blue spectacles without which no German doctor is complete, who lives in the house to tend "suffering William," steals the heart of "Sweet Honey," and ultimately marries "Little Mother," and becomes the father of "Boy." The story is varied with disquisitions upon the proper ways of educating children and treating servants, and extracts from medical works on madness; it is also plentifully sprinkled with words in italics.

The scamp who figures as chief actor, rather than hero, in Dr. Gordon-Stables's story, is the man who stole the body of A. T. Stewart, the American millionaire. At any rate, that is what the author represents, and it is not likely that he will be challenged by any rival claimant to the honour of that particular exploit. The subject is not a pleasant one, and no attempt has been made to soften its harshness. Elements of romance have been introduced, which darken instead of relieving the picture; but, so far as incidents and vicissitudes can make a story readable, 'The Mystery of a Millionaire's Grave' is as lively as any one could wish. Dr. Gordon-Stables has produced a matter-of-fact narrative interspersed with some sensational matter and rather affected pathos. This will be sufficient for large numbers of novel-readers, and under those circumstances it might be rash to say that the author has not written an attractive story.

'The Man from Manchester' is a detective story. The man himself aimed at dressing like a gentleman:—

"A heavy dark-green overcoat, trimmed with Astrakan, imparted to him rather a distingué air, that was further enhanced by his faultless kid gloves, and the crimson silk handkerchief that was allowed just to slightly display itself from the outside breast-pocket of his overcoat."

On a journey to London two ladies were in the railway carriage; one of them, who was seven or eight and twenty, is referred to as "the elderly lady." At the journey's end the gentleman "gracefully raised his highly-polished hat," and the elderly lady gave him her card, inscribed "Mrs. Sabena Neilson." The next day at about four in the afternoon the gentleman "arrayed himself in a spotless shirt, and a brown velvet coat—an article of attire he had a great partiality for—and looking very handsome and very gentlemanly," he drove to call on the lady, whom he found "in an evening dress of delicate blush-rose silk." The details of what happened afterwards are more sensational, but not more remarkable. The author is on safer ground in working out the story of a murder. To write a detective story has become more or less of a mechanical exercise, but to perform it really well requires far more power of accurate delineation of life and manners than the author of 'The Man from Manchester' can claim.

BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

- The Nursery Alice*. With Text adapted to Nursery Readers. By Lewis Carroll. (Macmillan & Co.)
Little Mother Bunch. By Mrs. Molesworth. (Cassell & Co.)
Will o' the Wisp. By Mrs. Hugh Bell. (Longmans & Co.)
The Blue Mountains. By Lewis Armytage. (Allen & Co.)
Oliver Langton's Ward. By Evelyn Everett Green. (Olliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.)
From the same Nest. By Mrs. G. Linnaeus Banks. ('Church Monthly' Office.)
Boy. By Helen Milman. (Griffith, Farran & Co.)
West-Nor-West. By Jessie M. E. Saxby. (Nisbet & Co.)
Jessie and May; or, the Fruits of Disobedience. By A. E. P. (Griffith, Farran & Co.)
My Lady Nell: an English Story of the Olden Time. By Emily Weaver. (Warne & Co.)

MR. LEWIS CARROLL has taken the infinitely little under his wing, and has given us a 'Nursery Alice' to be read by children from "nought to five." Not so much to be read, as he feelingly says, as "to be thumbed, to be cooed over, to be dog-eared, to be rumpled, to be kissed, by the illiterate, ungrammatical, dimpled Darlings, that fill your nursery with merry uproar." He will not be disappointed. It is a well-known fact that children of that age are apt to read with their thumbs; but we suspect that the 'Nursery Alice' will be read aloud by the hour by the complaisant nurse, glad to find that her usual task of reviving and stimulating a wandering attention is anticipated by the superabundant comments which Mr. Carroll thinks fit to interpolate freely, such as "Wasn't that funny?" "Do you see?" "Poor Alice!" "What do you think?" Mr. Carroll has taken the main incidents of Alice's chequered career and used them as plums to each chapter, and the result is very brilliant and entertaining. We miss, perhaps, one of the charms of the old Alice—her talent for moralizing and her philosophical attitude in the face of the monstrous works of nature with which she is confronted. She was essentially a well-brought-up child, and would doubtless have enjoyed the following little lecture on folk-lore, which Mr. Carroll introduces with so many apologies, and evident doubts as to its cordial reception by "nought to five":—

"And that reminds me. There's a little lesson I want to teach you, while we're looking at this picture of Alice and the cat. Now don't be in a bad temper about it, my dear child! It's a very little lesson indeed! Do you see that Fox-glove growing close to the tree? And do you know why it's called a Fox-glove? Perhaps you think it has something to do with a Fox? No, indeed! Foxes never wear gloves! The right word is 'Folk's-gloves.' Did you ever hear that Fairies used to be called the good 'Folk'? Now we've finished the lesson, and we'll wait a minute till you've got your temper again. Well? Do you feel quite good-natured again? No temper-ache? No crossness about the corners of the mouth? Then we'll go on."

Alice in the version before us has left off her famous habit of asking questions, and is slightly characterless in consequence, like the regulation Fairy Princess; but for her further development the child must, of course, wait to be promoted to the older version, whose dreamy restfulness and all-pervading sense of irresponsibility is no doubt the secret of its success with the children "of a certain age" whom Mr. Lewis Carroll is fortunate enough to include among his patrons. Mr. Tenniel's illustrations have been prettily and effectively coloured, in deference to received nursery taste, by Miss E. Gertrude Thompson; and we are pleased to see that Alice is as fresh and rosy in complexion as we have always imagined her to be, and looks by no means over-educated considering her immense amount of practical information on a great many subjects.

Mrs. Molesworth gives us in 'Little Mother Bunch' one of those delightful chronicles of child life and studies of child character in which she so greatly excels. Poor erring Tina, with her intrigues and her troubles, is a curious contrast to the straightforward little heroine, and the mistakes of the older people who belong to these charming children form most instructive reading to parents and guardians.

Mrs. Hugh Bell's "Will o' the Wisp" is a fascinating little scaremouch, whose daring deeds will endear him to the child readers of the attractive little book. Mrs. Bell has already made for herself a name as a dramatic writer, in French as well as in English; but we believe that 'Will o' the Wisp' is her first essay as a writer of children's stories. It is to be hoped it may not be her last.—'The Blue Mountains' is one of a collection of somewhat elaborate fairy tales, each with an intricate meaning, which the author, from time to time, expounds with painful care. We shall be surprised if 'The Blue Mountains' becomes popular with youthful readers.

'Oliver Langton's Ward' is a disappointment. Miss Everett Green has written such charming stories—'Dorothy's Vocation,' for instance, among others—that her readers have a right to expect better work from her than this mediocre version of the grim guardian and the wilful ward who begin by hating each other, but speedily marry and are happy ever after. It is to be hoped that Miss Everett Green may return to her former manner, and give her public more of those attractive tales with which her name has long been associated.

'From the same Nest' is even less attractive: it is a tedious tale, encumbered with much detail, of village folk, good, bad, and indifferent, but mostly indifferent. While as to 'Boy,' which appeared in the Newbery House Magazine, it is certainly a book to be kept out of the nursery. Grown-up people may do as they like; but the morbid imaginings of an incompris of eight, however charming be the poor little lad, are not healthy reading for the young.

It is a delightful change to turn to 'West-Nor'-West,' a fascinating book, and one which will, no doubt, be read with profit by many. A brave and loving mother sets out from Scotland to visit her sons in the Far West. She gives a description of the voyage to Quebec, and of the journey by the Canadian Pacific Railway, through the grand Canadian woods, to Winnipeg. The picture of the Scottish settlement, with its thriving farms, its kirk, and its energetic settlers, is charming; but Mrs. Saxby laments that there was "scarcely anything to tell that woman was in the territory at all! I wished with all my heart that I could have shipped off a dozen cargoes of well-assorted damselfs from Scotland to Canada, where women and women's work are so much required."

'Jessie and May' is a doleful and most unattractive little tale of the sad fate of disobedient children and their sorrowing parents.

My Lady Nell's lot is cast in troubled times, and her story is also the story of the Marian persecutions. There is much that is sad in the little book, but all comes right with the crowning of the Lady Elizabeth's grace. The attempt to render the conversations in Elizabethan English is not particularly successful and is certainly tedious.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

West African Stories, by Major A. B. Ellis (Chapman & Hall), is by no means a brilliant specimen of the book-maker's art, for which the exploits of fifteenth and sixteenth century Portuguese adventurers have furnished the most readable matter. One or two of the stories given are worth retelling, and of these 'The Ahboassi Mine' is quite the best; but the contents of the volume as a whole are rather dimly suggestive of pre-existence in the padding pages of a boys' magazine, with one singular, though not bright exception, a commonplace sketch of a successful rascal's career, the appearance of which in such juxtaposition is in curious taste.

Robert Browning: Personal Notes (Unwin) is a pretty little volume containing an article by Mr. Gosse which appeared in the Century Magazine some nine or ten years ago, and also a paper lately contributed by Mr. Gosse to the New Review. Both are written with Mr. Gosse's usual skill and charm; but we prefer the latter. Too much of the former is taken up, although not through any fault of Mr. Gosse's, with Mr. Browning's grievances against Macready. It was a curious fact that a man so amiable as Robert Browning, and indifferent to adverse criticism, should, to the end of his days, have cherished a bitter feeling in regard to the treatment his plays received. It would seem to show that the theatre develops an extreme sensitiveness in authors as well as in actors. The real truth is that, except the 'Blot in the 'Scutcheon,' none of Mr. Browning's dramas was well adapted for the stage.

We have received from the Government printers at Melbourne, "Trübner & Co." being given as the agents in this country, Mr. Hayter's second volume of the Victorian Year-Book for 1888-89. The Victorian statistics, admirable as they are, are year by year improved, and the present volume gives more room than has been previously allotted to an examination of the educational system of the Australasian colonies.

The Report on Canadian Archives for 1889, by Mr. Douglas Brymner (Ottawa, Brown Chamberlin), contains, among other interesting documents, a diary of General Haldimand during his visit to England in 1786. A scrap of information in this diary gives another reason for the capitulation at Yorktown, or, rather, it shows why the fleet was so long in leaving New York to relieve Lord Cornwallis. The dock carpenters at New York went on strike, and this delayed for a fortnight the sailing of the fleet. General Haldimand remarks that the fact is little known; it now appears in print for the first time in this volume. When the Canadian archives are all calendared the student of history will have good reason to thank those who have done the work. The only drawback to this volume is the absence of an index.

The Western Antiquary, edited by Mr. Wright, has begun issuing a supplement dealing with book-plates.

We have on our table the catalogues of Mr. Baker (theological), Messrs. Garratt, Mr. Irvine, Mr. Jackson, Mr. May (rather interesting), Messrs. Myers & Co., Mr. Parsons (some good books), Messrs. Rimell (illustrated works), and Messrs. Wesley & Son (entomology); also of Mr. Lowe of Birmingham (interesting), Messrs. Matthews & Brooke of Bradford, Messrs. Macmillan & Bowes of Cambridge (mathematics, part ii.), Mr. Murray of Derby, Mr. Baxendine of Edinburgh, Mr. Teale of Halifax, Mr. Potter of Liverpool, Mr. Thorpe of Reading, Messrs. Hiscock & Son of Richmond (Surrey), and Mr. Nichols of Sheffield (fairly good). M. Charavay has sent two catalogues of valuable autographs; M. Neubner of Cologne a catalogue of Italian and Spanish books, and one of English literature; and M. Liess of Berlin one of books relating to Germany. Messrs. Scribner & Welford of New York have also forwarded their catalogue.

We have on our table London and Londonderry, Transactions of Three Centuries considered from a Historical and Legal Standpoint (Marcus Ward),—The Federal Constitution of Germany, with an Historical Introduction, translated by E. J. James (Philadelphia, Johnson),—In Far Dakota, by Mrs. Mary Locke (Allen & Co.),—Bradshaw's Dictionary of Bathing Places (Trübner & Co.),—Elements of French Commercial Correspondence, by G. Korts, Part II. (Hachette),—Complete Ready Reckoner (Heywood),—A Syllabus of Elementary Dynamics, by W. N. Stocker (Macmillan),—Glimpses into Nature's Secrets, by E. A. Martin (Stock),—A Handy Guide to Dry-Fly Fishing, by C. Iays (Low),—The Two Kinds of Truth, by T. E. S. T. (Fisher Unwin),—A Radical Cure for Ireland, by Chichester's Ghost (Blackwood),—Transactions of the Cremation Society of England, No. III. (Office, 8, Cavendish Street, W.),—Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea as proposed for Adoption by the International Marine Conference held at Washington, 1889 (Portsmouth Griffin),—Everybody's Scrapbook of Curious Facts by Don Lemon (Saxon & Co.),—Danielle Cortis translated from the Italian of A. Fogazzaro by S. L. Simeon (Remington),—Miss Ludington's Sister, by E. Bellamy (Warne),—A Far-away Melody, and other Stories, by Mary E. Wilkins (Edinburgh, Douglas),—Hard Luck, or a Murder at Monte Carlo, by A. W. A. Beckett (Simpkin),—The Confessions of a Door-mat, by A. C. Calmour (White & Co.),—Ruth Lavender, by D. M. Jones (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier),—Who is the Man? by J. S. Tait (Chapman & Hall),—"Mine Own Familiar Friend," by A. L. Harris (Warne),—The Rogues' Gallery, by C. T. Clarkson and J. H. Richardson (Field & Tuer),—Simple Stories of London, by J. Williams (Edinburgh, Black),—Harp Strums, by G. Deans (Kelso, Rutherford),—Gettysburg, and other Poems, by I. R. Penny-packer (Philadelphia, Porter & Coates),—Les Plaidours, by J. Racine, with Introduction and Notes by E. G. W. Braunholtz (Cambridge, University Press),—Longfellow's Latest Poems (Routledge),—Gems from the East, compiled by H. P. B. (Theosophical Publishing Company),—Notable Yorkshire Churches ('Church Bells' Office),—Short Notes on Portions of the Book of Common Prayer for the Use of Training Colleges and Schools, by the Rev. F. L. H. Millard (Liverpool, Philip, Son & Nephew),—Natural Religion, from the 'Apologie des Christenthums' of Franz Hettinger, D.D., edited by H. S. Bowden (Burns & Oates)

—The Historical Christ, the Moral Power of History, by the Rev. D. H. Greer, D.D. (New York, Dutton). — The One Mediator, or Sacrifice and Sacraments, by W. Humphrey, S.J. (Burns & Oates). — The Gospel according to St. Luke, with Map, Introduction, and Notes by F. W. Farrar, D.D. (Cambridge, University Press). — The Synagogue, not the Temple, by the Rev. J. Gall (Simpkin). — Les Artistes Célèbres: A. L. Barye, by A. Alexandre (Paris, Librairie de L'Art). — Inscriptions Antiques de la Côte d'Or, by Paul Lejay (Paris, Bouillon). — Nouveaux Essais de Critique Philosophique, by A. Franck (Hachette). — Die Rhetorik und Jüdische Homiletik, by Dr. L. Philippson (Leipzig, Fernau). — Il Teorema del Parallelogramma delle Forze Dimostrato Erroneo, by G. Casazza (Brescia, Savoldi). — Sesenheim, from Goethe's 'Dichtung und Wahrheit,' edited, with an Introduction and Notes, by H. C. O. Huss (Boston, Heath & Co.). — and Le Désert, by A. Mellion (Paris, Hachette). Among New Editions we have Goschen's Foreign Exchanges (Wilson). — Jukes's School Manual of Geology, edited by A. J. Jukes-Browne (Edinburgh, Black). — Demosthenis pro Ctesiphonte, de Corona Oratio, edited by B. Drake (Macmillan). — Andersen's Fairy Tales, edited for School Use by A. Gardiner (Heywood). — and Domestic Cookery, with Special Reference to Cooking by Gas, by H. M. Young (Warrington, the Author). Also the following Pamphlets: The Secular Office, a General Guide to the Divine Office extra Chorum, by the Rev. E. J. Ryan (Dublin, Gill). — The Outcome of Individualism, by J. H. Levy (Pewtress & Co.). — and Things of Indix made Plain, by W. M. Wood, Part III. Sec. V. (Stock).

LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

ENGLISH.

Theology.

- Gibbon's (Rev. J. M.) Eternal Life, Notes of Expository Sermons, cr. 8vo. 4/6 cl.
 Hughes's (Rev. L.) Analysis of the Catechism of the Church of England, cr. 8vo. 2/ cl.
 James's (Rev. H.) The Country Clergyman and his Work, Six Lectures, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
 Latham's (Rev. H.) Pastor Pastorum, or the Schooling of the Apostles by our Lord, cr. 8vo. 6/6 cl.
 Mead's (C. M.) Supernatural Revelation, an Essay, 14/ cl.
 Stubbs's (W.) For Christ and City, Liverpool Sermons and Addresses, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
 Vaughan's (Rev. C. J.) Epistle to the Hebrews, with Notes, cr. 8vo. 7/6 cl.

Fine Art.

- Thomson's (D. C.) The Barbizon School of Painters, Corot, Rousseau, &c., folio, 63/ cl.

Poetry.

- Hudson's (Rev. J.) The Dream of Pilate's Wife, a Poem, 2/ Malleson's (Rev. F. A.) Holiday Studies of Wordsworth, 5/

Philosophy.

- Gillespie's (J.) The Triumph of Philosophy, roy. 16mo. 2/6.
 Naden's (C. W.) Induction and Deduction, edited by R. Lewins, 8vo. 7/6 cl.

History and Biography.

- Davis (T.) The Memoirs of an Irish Patriot, 1840-1846, by Sir C. G. Duffy, 8vo. 12/ cl.
 Evans's (E. T.) History and Topography of the Parish of Hendon, cr. 8vo. 7/6 cl.
 Ewald's (A. C.) Paper and Parchment, Historical Sketches, cr. 8vo. 6/ half-parchment.
 Forster's (J.) Four Great Teachers, Ruskin, Carlyle, Emerson, Browning, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
 Malleson's (Col. G. B.) Akbar, cr. 8vo. 2/6. (Rulers of India.)
 Merivale's (Rev. C.) Romans under the Empire, cheap edition, Vols. 1 and 2, 3/6 each.
 Reich's (E.) History of Civilization, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
 Sedgwick's (Rev. A.) Life and Letters, by J. W. Clark and T. McK. Hughes, 2 vols. 8vo. 38/ cl.
 Yonge's Cameos from English History, Seventh Series, 5/ cl.

Geography and Travel.

- Dobson's (G.) Russia's Railway Advance into Central Asia, cr. 8vo. 7/6 cl.
 Evans's (Rev. A. C.) The Cruise of H.M.S. Calliope, 2/sd.
 Junker's (Dr. W.) Travels in Africa during 1875-78, translated by A. H. Keane, 8vo. 21/ cl.
 Oliver's (Capt. P.) Madagascar, or Robert Drury's Journal during Fifteen Years' Captivity on that Island, 5/ cl.

Philology.

- Lange's (F.) Progressive German Reader, Advanced Part, 3/ Science.
 Beaumont's (W. M.) The Shadow Test in the Diagnosis and Estimation of Ametropia, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
 Cragin's (E. B.) Essentials of Gynaecology, cr. 8vo. 5/ cl.
 Kirkpatrick's (T. S. G.) The Hydraulic Gold-Miner's Manual, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
 Luard's (Major-General C. E.) Stone, How to Get It and How to Use It, 8vo. 2/ cl.
 Newman's (J.) Earthwork Slips and Subsidence upon Public Works, cr. 8vo. 7/6 cl.
 Rankin's (F. H.) Hygiene of Childhood, cr. 8vo. 3/ cl.
 Stelwagon's (H. W.) Essentials of Diseases of the Skin, 5/ cl.
 Wolff's (L.) Examination of the Urine, cr. 8vo. 4/6 cl.

General Literature.

- Allsop's (R. O.) The Turkish Bath, its Design and Construction, 8vo. 6/ cl.
 A-he's (Rev. R. P.) Two Kings of Uganda, cheap ed. 3/6 cl.
 Bain's (T. W.) Ocean's Razor, the Application of a Principle, cr. 8vo. 4/6 cl.
 Barnum's (P. T.) Funny Stories, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
 Barrett's (F.) Fettered for Life, 12mo. 2/ cl.
 Barrett's (F.) Lieutenant Barnabas, cr. 8vo. 2/ bds.
 Blackie's Modern Cyclopedia, Vol. 6, 8vo. 6/ cl.
 Boye's (J. F.) The Men of the Time Birthday Book, 2/6 cl.
 Clifton's (A.) An Unwilling Wife, a Tale of the Indian Mutiny, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
 Colmore's (G.) A Conspiracy of Silence, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
 Finn's (G. M.) Princess Fedor's Pledge, and other Stories, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
 Fiske's (A. K.) Midnight Talks at the Club, 12mo. 6/ cl.
 Henley's (W. E.) Views and Reviews, 12mo. 5/ cl.
 Kennard's (Mrs. E.) Matron or Maid, a Novel, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
 Lady Baby, a Novel, by D. Gerard, cheap edition, 6/ cl.
 Morals and Manners of the Seventeenth Century, being the Characters of La Bruyère translated by H. Stolt, 2/6 cl.
 Phillips's (F. C.) Young Mr. Alinalie's Courtship, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
 Phillippe-Wolley's (C.) Snap, a Legend of the Lone Mountain, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
 Reade's (Mrs. C.) Monsignor, a Novel, cr. 8vo. 2/ bds.
 Rutherford's (M.) Miriam's Schooling, and other Papers, 6/ Scientific Education (The) of Dogs for the Gun, by H. H., 6/ Thomas's (B.) The House on the Fear, a Tale of South Devon, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
 Toxar, a Romance, by Author of 'Thoth', cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
 Walbey's (Mrs. C.) From the Farm to the Battle-Field, Three Stories, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
 Waldmeier (Theophilus), Autobiography, of cheap ed. 8vo. 2/ Wilcox's (M.) The Paradise in Hyde Park, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.

FOREIGN.

Theology.

- Lactantii Opera, rec. S. Brandt, Part 1, 25m.
 Fine Art and Archaeology.
 Bergner (H. H.) Der Gute Hirt in der Altchristlichen Kunst, 1m. 50.
 Breton (J.) La Vie d'un Artiste, 3fr. 50.
 Gilbert (O.) Die Stadt Rom im Altertum, Part 3, 10m.
 Svoronos (J. N.) Numismatique de la Crète Ancienne, Part 1, 50fr.
 Trésors des Églises exposés en 1889 au Trocadéro, 1890r.
 Valette (M.) Les Révolutions de l'Art, 12fr.

Philosophy.

- Baumann: Geschichte der Philosophie, 7m.
 History and Biography.
 Amélie de Vitrolles, 2 vols. 15fr.
 Chatelet: La Folie de J. J. Rousseau, 3fr. 50.
 Mémoires de Saint-Simon, éd. de A. de Boialale, Vol. 7, 7fr. 50.
 Schalte (K. H.) Die Juden in England vom 8 Jahrh., 2m.
 Souvenirs du Baron de Barante, 1782-1886, Vol. 1, 7fr. 50.
 Geography and Travel.
 Leclerc (M.) Lettres du Brésil, 3fr. 50.

Philology.

- Anthologie Planudes: Appendix Barberino-Vaticana, rec. L. Stenbach, 4m.
 Athenaei Dipsosiphista, rec. G. Kaibel, Vol. 3, 7m. 50.
 Herlet (B.) Die sog. Yzopets, 2m. 40.
 Herodotos, Buch 2, hrsg. v. A. Wiedemann, 12m.
 Bill Italic Punicæ, ed. L. Bauer, Vol. 1, 2m. 40.
 Weber (H.) Questiones Catullianæ, 4m.
 Xenophon's Historia Græca, rec. O. Keller, 10m.

General Literature.

- Audebrand (P.) La Clé d'Argent, 3fr. 50.
 Bonnières (R. de) Le Petit Margemont, 3fr. 50.
 Brunetière (F.) L'Évolution des Genres dans l'Histoire de la Littérature, Vol. 1, 3fr. 50.
 Chapuron (P.) Daniel Servan, 3fr. 50.
 Chut: Fredaines, 3fr. 50.
 D'Héricault (C.) Le Roman d'un Propriétaire, 3fr. 50.
 Hugo (V.) En Voyage, 7fr. 50.

AMERICAN COPYRIGHT.

8, Delamere Terrace, W., June 5, 1890.

It may be advisable, before expressing an opinion on this subject, to state that I have no pecuniary interest in it. American citizenship and a residence of twenty-two years in England have enabled me to secure copyright of my own works in both countries; and I have no connexion with any publishing house. In reading English comments on the recent rejection by the United States House of Representatives of an International Copyright Bill I have sympathized deeply with their indignation at the continuance of an injustice to English authors, but recognize a prevalent error in their apprehension of the situation. The Bill just rejected was unjust to English authors. It required simultaneous publication of the book in England and America, which would render it impossible for a new author to avail himself of press notices in his negotiations with American houses. When Darwin published 'The Origin of Species,' on which he had worked many years, he had no reputation which could command a fair price. Had he been able to register his title in America, and so secure copyright until the impression made by his work had extended to America, he might have named his own price. Mrs. Humphry Ward, under such a Bill as that just rejected in Congress, would have been compelled to accept any pittance the American publisher chose to offer for 'Robert Elsmere.' Twenty-five hours after its publication in England her copyright would be forfeited, if not previously secured. A few months later she could have secured a large price. The rejected Bill might be useful to famous authors, or to the few among them who are not well placed in America; but the majority of English authors would hardly find their present position improved under these compulsory regulations. At present, if a new book succeeds in England the author is generally offered something for his "authorization" of some Transatlantic edition; but he could not get that if he had, under compulsion, disposed of his copyright for whatever a publisher chose to give him. Thus the authors who least need the advantages of American copyright would monopolize them. All books unable to secure simultaneous publication in America would be left without protection to a piracy established in law.

So strong is my sense of the injustice of the Bill to English authors that I have declined to join the International Copyright League in America, because of its identification with it. I visited the senator who framed it, and he appeared to feel the injustice of the clause referred to, but said that there must be compromises, and the measure could not be passed without this provision. But it now appears that it cannot be passed with it. The opinion has been expressed in the Athenæum that the rejection proves the need of more enlightenment among the Americans on the subject of literary property. That, however, will only be proved when Congress has rejected a measure honestly directed to do justice to English authors. No such measure has been before it in recent years. American representatives are shrewd enough to discover a local selfishness disguised as international justice. One American interest has been pitted against another, and the stronger has won. The English author has no reason to feel much aggrieved. His prospect of justice is even improved. It is said, I know, that if we had passed the Bill, its faults might have been eliminated by subsequent legislation. That is possible, but it could only be after the present generation of authors has fallen asleep. The actual author can hardly be contented to waive his interests in favour of the possible author, if there is a possibility of his doing better. However, speculation is now useless. The American Congress has clearly determined that this Bill shall not become law. Further enlightenment will not improve its chances, for the more the scheme has been discussed and reconsidered, the more has it been perceived that the petitioners are in the case of the sparrow who pleaded with the hawk against his predatory spirit, until choked with what seemed to be emotion, but proved to be a bit of worm.

English authors have been taking it for granted that the defeated Bill was a good one on their faith in some of its eminent supporters, some of whom have taken it for granted in much the same way. The answer to criticisms has been that half a loaf is better than no bread. Now that the half loaf, admitting it such, is finally refused, it seems about time that English authors should take some initiative. If they can agree on some just and practicable measure of self-defence they are not without means of making a good fight for it. There is no reason why American authors should enjoy their present facilities of copyright in England while reciprocal advantages are withheld from English authors in the United States. And although such retaliation might seem to be unfair towards American authors, who all favour international copyright, it would not be really so if it should be the means of relieving them from their grievous burden of having to compete with workmen without wages. Nor would the blow fall on American authors exclusively—perhaps not chiefly. Without, however, going further into this, let me say that I do not believe any retaliation will be necessary if the authors of England and America can come to a fair understanding as to any measure that will protect them without injustice to the legitimate interests of others. Nor is there any difficulty whatever in framing such a measure. Justice would be done to all by permitting any publisher to issue the foreign book under the condition of paying the author his royalty on every copy sold. This would not prevent an author from selling to a favoured publisher his proofs, with the advantage of priority on the market. The more publishers that issue an author's work the better for the author, provided every copy sold contains the evidence of his payment. A scheme of this kind has been prepared, and was submitted by myself to George Hooley, of New York, a leading American lawyer, who, after careful emendations, pronounced it entirely adequate for its purpose. It would secure every author; it would largely increase typographical work. The great publishing houses naturally opposed it, for they desire to monopolize the foreign author. But since these must now have made up their minds that they cannot obtain such monopoly, it is probable that they will, in their turn, consider the advantages of the half loaf. However, the publisher is strong enough to fight his own battles. Whatever economic theory the author may hold on the subject of the internal commercial arrangements of a foreign country, there is no necessity that his own case should be involved in such trade controversies. The right of a foreign author to be paid for his literary product, if detached from such complications and placed on its own merits, would not be denied by one American in ten thousand.

MONCURE D. CONWAY.

THE 'ANTI-JACOBIN.'

AMONGST the many mysteries surrounding the Anti-Jacobin the greatest of all is its sudden discontinuance when the tide of its influence and prosperity was at the full. The memoirs of the period which so far have been published cast no light on the incident, though it created a good deal of speculation at the time, so that the cause or causes have been left to surmise. Perhaps its scurrility, which did not spare cousins of the sacred caste who happened to be of the "Opposition" way of thinking (or, at any rate, of voting) in politics—perhaps its frequent coarseness of language and occasional coarseness of moral tone, together with its blasphemous way of attacking "blasphemy," frightened the Wilberforcean wing of its own party—either or all of these causes may have contributed to its fall; but surely they were faults which might have been cured or abated by some remedy short of killing. Or it may have struck Pitt that his young men, with Canning at their head, were identifying themselves too much with interchanges of journalistic Billingsgate for the dignity of the Government, and that their time and talents might be more profitably employed than in polishing epigrams which tended, perhaps, rather to embitter than to allay the growling, hungry discontent in England and the armed rebellion in Ireland, which were straining all the powers of the administration. Anything more preposterous in the way of blind optimism than is expressed in the following lines in 'New Morality' can hardly be conceived:—

True, thou [Britain] art rich, art powerful!—thru' thine Isle Industrious skill, contented labour, smile;

and Pitt, who had the burden on his shoulders, may have thought he had had enough of it.

Whatever may have been the reason for the sudden extinction of this brilliant coruscation, the only one offered, though plausible enough, was no reason at all. The conductors were able to fall back on a statement in the prospectus that the paper would be "continued every Monday morning during the sitting of Parliament," a saving clause probably adopted to ensure a graceful retreat in case of failure. But there had been no failure, and the saving clause had been, probably, entirely forgotten until a reason was required for sudden cessation. Parliament rose in the week beginning June 24th, 1798, but the number of the Anti-Jacobin issued on the 25th gave no hint that the paper was in articulo mortis. On the contrary, the publisher invited, as usual, "orders for the Paper and communications from Correspondents." The announcement of discontinuance was made in the following number (or rather pair of numbers, for there was a double issue on July 2nd), and on the succeeding Monday (July 9th) the Anti-Jacobin appeared for the last time. This last number contained a review of the career of the paper, and of the work it supposed itself to have accomplished. But no reason for the abandonment of its task was forthcoming, beyond the vain pretext before mentioned. The article contained many reasons (implicitly) for continuance: "We trust we have done the State some service," "We have driven the Jacobins from many strongholds," "We have exposed their Principles," and so on.

"With this impression on the minds of our Readers, WE TAKE OUR LEAVE OF THEM. Their welfare is in their own hands; if they suffer the Jacobins to regain any of the influence of which we have deprived them, they will compromise their own safety; but we shall be blameless.....WE have done our Duty."

That the writers of this nonsense cherished no illusions which made things seem to them as if they had killed "Jacobinism," is apparent between the lines of the nonsense itself. It is made indisputable by these lines in the 'New Morality' which accompanied the valedictory address:—

No pause—no rest—'till weltering on the ground
The poisonous Hydra lies, and pierc'd with many a wound;
but it was the late editor, William Gifford, who was called upon by Canning and Co. to do the work single-handed. They told him he should be considered "indolent" if he did not continue the conflict until he killed the Hydra, and thus not only give virtue (that would die with them, if he did not keep it alive) a chance, but delight future ages with his "playful page"! Gifford did continue the conflict in another sphere, but he does not delight us with much playfulness. The absurdity of the address to poor Gifford did not escape the editor of the 'Beauties of the Anti-Jacobin,' who has his fling at the retiring Sybarites while filling his piratical pockets with the spoils of their deserted tents. In his note to the address he writes:—

"It may perhaps be asked in this place, by some, whether this exhortation to continued exertion..... might not, with propriety, be retorted on the bards themselves, who ceased their labours before the Hydra was half-defeated!"

At least two "Anti-Jacobin" periodicals immediately rose from the ashes of the phoenix—the Old English Gentleman; or, Anti-Jacobin Examiner, and the monthly Anti-Jacobin Review and Magazine. The former presented itself to the foe twice a week, being conscious, no doubt, that at least a double quantity would be required to make up for the deficiency in quality. It had the ill grace to complain of its opportunity, reproaching the conductors of its predecessor with having preferred to create a meteor instead of a planet—it made no such mistake, but that did not save it from guttering out speedily—and for contenting themselves "with the Laurels which they had gained, without any Attempt to improve their Victory." The Anti-Jacobin Review, which was started with John Gifford (alias John Richards Green) as editor, and with a strong commendatory paragraph from the Anti-Jacobin, "lamented" the discontinuance, and confessed, after nine months of its own conflict with the Hydra, that the Hydra was not a penny the worse, that the monster had raised its head as soon as the Anti-Jacobin retired, and that "the Jacobin prints have become more profligate than ever." This was a poor result from the point of view of national virtue, perhaps; but it suited the magazine very well, for it lived on with the Hydra through an inglorious, though presumably profitable existence for more than twenty years. Whether the Hydra was killed, or whether it has outlived its enemy into our own day, does not concern the Athenæum, but the moral is the same: when one adopts monster-killing as a profession, it is well to select a monster with a robust constitution. J. D. C.

Ottawa, May 27, 1890.

In the report of the joint librarians of the Parliament of Canada, presented in January, 1890, the following passage occurs:—

"Among other such interesting additions to the library may be mentioned a copy of the 'Anti-Jacobin,' purchased at second-hand, which on careful examination proved to be the copy owned by Sir James Mackintosh, from whom, as his friend Lord Macaulay said, 'scholars and statesmen loved to receive the lessons of a serene and benevolent wisdom.' In these volumes Sir James Mackintosh has noted, on the authority of Canning, from whose copy the notes were transferred at the house of Dundas in Scotland, the authors of the various satirical pieces in that famous periodical."

The volumes were offered to the library for sale by a second-hand dealer. On examining the first volume I found on the title-page the following inscription:—

"At Duneira, Sept. 27th, 1801, the seat of Mr. Dundas, I found a copy of the 'Poetry of the Anti-Jacobin,' with the name 'George Canning' written upon it in his hand. In this book I found all the poetry and some pieces in prose marked with the initials of the authors, which I have copied in the margin of these volumes. I understood the initials as follows:—

E = G. Ellis.
F = Frere.
C = Canning.

Where two or more initials are joined I understand it to mean that two or more authors were concerned in the piece, or in the particular part of it where the initials are placed. JAMES MACKINTOSH.
Guilford St., 3rd Nov. 1801."

On the back of the fly-leaf there is this additional inscription:—

"All Lies, 'Misrepresentations,' 'Mistakes,' were written for this work by Mr. Gifford.

"Song on Invasion," p. 103. This I suppose to be the piece of poetry which has been attributed to Mr. Pitt. I have understood from Mr. Frere that one is to be found in the collection. R. W. H."

In lead pencil on the inside of the cover there is this note:—

"Those underlined are added from Mr. Frere's copy."

I am unable to trace the history of the volumes, which bear date 1799 (Wright, Piccadilly); nor am I able to identify the writer of the pencil note, or the initials "R. W. H." But I find that Sir James Mackintosh lived in Guilford Street at the date of his note; and I am disposed to accept the memorandum as genuine.

Assuming this to be the case, let us see how the pieces are marked:—

Insurrection on the Door of Mrs. Brownrigg's Cell, vol. i. p. 35.—C., F., E., omnes.

Friend of Humanity and the Knife-grinder, vol. i. p. 71.—C., F.

Meeting of the Friends of Freedom, vol. i. p. 91.—J. H. Frere.

The Soldier's Friend, vol. i. p. 169.—F.

Letter from a Lady, vol. i. p. 195.—Canning.

Latin Verses—"Ipsa mali Hortatrix," &c.—Lord Wellesley.

Translation of the above—"Parent of countless crimes," &c.—Lord Morpeth.

To the Author of the 'Epistle to the Editors,'

"Bard of the borrowed lyre," &c., vol. i. p. 371.—Canning.

The Epistle to the Editors.—Hon. W. Lamb.

Acme and Septimus, vol. i. p. 452.—E.

Progress of Man, vol. i. pp. 525-558.—Canning.

Ode, "Whither, O Bacchus," &c., vol. i. p. 627.—E.

Progress of Man, vol. ii. p. 98.—C., F.

Poetry—an Essay, vol. ii. p. 162.—C.

Loves of the Triangles, vol. ii. p. 168.—F., G. C.

five lines of first part.

Loves of the Triangles, vol. ii. p. 200.—E., F., and C. Brissot's Ghost, vol. ii. p. 236.—W. J. Rose (second son of G. Rose).

Loves of the Triangles, vol. ii. p. 274.—E., C., F. (apparently mostly done by F.).

Elegy on the Death of Jean St. André, vol. ii. p. 315.—C., E., F.

The Rovers; or, the Double Arrangement, vol. ii. p. 461.—E., C., F., in common, but mostly by F.

New Morality, vol. ii. p. 623.—F., C. (mostly by C.).

This memorandum may serve to clear up some disputes, or it may be of no value at all. In any case it is at your service.

MARTIN J. GRIFFIN.

* * This seems to show that a marked copy of the 'Poetry of the Anti-Jacobin' which had belonged to Canning once existed, though Mr. Hayward failed to trace it. Perhaps it may be still preserved at Duneira, and it may, perhaps, be found that the markings were done by Canning. But there are confusions. Sir James Mackintosh says he found all the poetry marked with the initials of the authors, and that he noted them—all, presumably—in his copy of the complete 'Anti-Jacobin' reprint of 1799. Mr. Griffin's memorandum mentions but a few. "Canning's copy" quoted by Mr. Edmonds is also cited as an authority for only a few pieces, and these are not all the same as those mentioned by Mr. Griffin. Again, the attributions of the two so-called "Canning copies" do not always correspond; and neither tallies with the memoranda quoted as Frere's. The tangle of contradictory evidence seems to be hopelessly beyond unravelment.

10, Benson Road, Forest Hill, S.E., June 9, 1890.

It may interest your correspondent J. D. C. (Athen., May 31st) to know that I picked up a copy of 'The Beauties of the Anti-Jacobin' a day or two after reading his letter. The binding is broken, but the book itself is in good preservation. H. E. CLARKE.

THE UNAUTHORIZED REPRINTING OF POEMS.

June 9, 1890.

NEARLY a year ago you were good enough to allow me to protest in your columns against the unauthorized publication of one of my sonnets in the Bible Society Monthly Reporter. Would you now permit me to state that I find that on April 11th last a well-known weekly newspaper entitled Public Opinion was guilty of a similar infringement of the law relating to copyright, having printed one of my sonnets without my knowledge, permission, or authority? The proprietors of the Bible Society Monthly Reporter subsequently paid me for the use of my work; but the proprietor of Public Opinion appears to be unwilling to do so, and it only remains for me to take legal proceedings to compel payment.

SAMUEL WADDINGTON.

THE HOSPITALLERS IN ENGLAND.

IN these columns last week I examined a pamphlet in some detail to show that a certain charitable society had been circulating false and misleading statements in support of its claim to recognition as part of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem. I desire now to direct attention to the very equivocal proceedings of the Crown with regard to this society.

On May 14th, 1888, the Crown incorporated this charitable society by charter as "The Grand Priory of the Order of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem in England," under the presidency of a Grand Prior, with Bailiffs, Commanders, Knights, &c. Thus the charter gives the society the full title of the Priory of England in the Order, and gives certain members of the society the titles of various dignitaries in that Priory; thereby suggesting that the Crown recognizes the society as part of the Order. The charter, however, does not contain any such recognition, or any allusion to the Order at all; and the recital that the society has existed for more than fifty years clearly refers to the formation of this society in 1831, and not to the formation of the Order in the days of the Crusades. In fact, the charter is drawn in such a way that, without committing the Crown to anything, it suggests a false inference.

The charter also prescribes a cross for the members of this charitable society, and a regulation of the Lord Chamberlain of March 11th, 1889, permits them to wear it at Court. The cross of the Order is the eight-pointed cross, commonly called Maltese since the long residence of the Order at Malta. The cross of the charitable society consists of a Maltese cross in glaring white enamel with two pairs of lions and unicorns of diminutive size and subdued colouring stowed away between the arms. In the dexterous subordination of the points of difference to the points of likeness it rivals the most deceptive of fraudulent trade-marks; and yet it is prescribed by the Crown. Thus the Crown does not allow the members of this society to wear the cross of the Order, to which they would be entitled if they really were members of the Order, but nevertheless enjoins them to wear something which may be easily mistaken for that cross.

The Crown unquestionably was acting within its powers in granting this charter of incorporation; but there is considerable room for doubt whether the advisers of the Crown ought not to have foreseen, if they did not actually foresee, that the granting of this charter was calculated to promote an attempted imposture.

CECIL TORR.

SALES.

MESSRS. SOTHEY, WILKINSON & HODGE sold the following autographs last week: Claude, Count de Bonneval, two autograph letters signed to his cousin, 20l. François Henri, Duc de Luxembourg, A.L.s. to the Governor of Fumes, October 28th, 1690, 22l. Duchess de Montpensier, autograph draft of a projected will, 21l. Thirty-three original deeds of various dates between 1653 and 1702, relating to the reign of Louis XIV., 71l. Three documents relating to the succession of Gaston d'Orléans, 63l. Fourteen documents conveying land to the king which is required for enlarging the palace grounds, 21l. Document of the sale of the estate of Bourguival to Louis XIV., signed by Colbert and others, 20l. Antoine Philippe d'Orléans, Duc de Montpensier, to his brother Louis Philippe, October and November, 1803, four A.L.s., 31l.

The sale of the library of the late Sir Edward Sullivan, Bart., at the rooms of Messrs. Sothey, Wilkinson & Hodge, has been continued. The following were the principal lots sold from the fourteenth day to the nineteenth inclusive: Ovide par Bannier, 27l. Prior's Life of Goldsmith, illustrated, 35l. Purchas his Pilgrimes, 56l. Rogers's Italy and Poems, a magnificent specimen of Bedford's binding, 103l.; Plates to Italy and Poems without Text, 17l. Roman de la Rose, facsimile reprint of Dupré's edition, 21l. 10s. Ruskin's Modern Painters, 24l., and his Stones of Venice, 17l. Saint-Simon, Mémoires, 20l. Sévigné, Lettres, illustrated with autograph letters, 125l. Shakespeare's Plays, second edition, 40l.; and third, 60l. Silius Italicus, from the library of Marguerite de Valois, 46l. Stirling's Adagia of Erasmus, printed on vellum, 18l. Tennyson's Poems by Two Brothers, 21l. 10s.; Tennyson's Victim, 32l.; and Window, 25l. Thackeray's Paris Sketch-Book, 8l. 10s. The total already amounts to over 10,000l.

THE SUMMER PUBLISHING SEASON.

MESSRS. DEAN & SON have in preparation 'Bismarck Intime,'—'Scenes through the Battle Smoke,' by the Rev. A. Male,—'French Soldiers in German Prisons,' by Canon Guers,—and 'Canary Birds,' by Dr. Karl Russ.

WASHINGTON'S ANCESTRY.

My notes on 'The Ancestry of Washington' have, as I expected, attracted considerable notice, and called forth more or less comment. I have not, however, seen anything like a logical discussion of the point upon which the theory which I have set forth depends.

The vital question is: Who was that Lawrence Washington, M.A., who was acting as a temporary surrogate, for a special purpose, at Whethamsted, Herts, on the 29th of January, 1649/50? It is a question which must be answered by every one who makes a study of the problem of Washington's ancestry. Upon the answer given to it depends, I believe, the solution of the problem, and according to that answer my case must stand or fall. Can it be answered? I claim that it can be, and that I have given the only reasonable answer. It is a question which can be divided into two parts.

First: Was he, or was he not, the husband of Amphilis Washington, and the father of John, Lawrence, and the other Washington children mentioned in the will of Mr. Andrew Knowling, of Tring? That will was offered for probate at Whethamsted the very day that Mr. Washington was acting as temporary surrogate there, viz., 29th January, 1649/50. Under it Mrs. Amphilis Washington and her children were by far the largest beneficiaries; and one of her sons, called in the will "Lawrence Washington the younger," then a lad of fourteen, was the godson of Mr. Knowling, and evidently regarded by him as an adopted son and heir, since he received all the testator's freehold lands and tenements throughout the realm of England, as well as all the residue of his personal estate, after the payment of debts and legacies and funeral expenses. There is every reason, then, to believe that the husband of this Amphilis, the father of this Lawrence the younger, would be present in court on the day on which the will of his wife's stepfather was offered for probate. To suppose the contrary would, indeed, be most unreasonable. That husband and father, as we learn from the parish register, was a "Mr. Larrance Washington." Surely we must suppose that this Mr. Larrance Washington was in court that day at Whethamsted. When, then, we find a paper containing the record of an acknowledgment made, an oath taken, on that very day and at that very place "coram Laurentio Washington, in Art: magro: surrog: offi:lis etc. hac vice," plain common sense would suggest that this Laurence Washington, in Artibus Magister, and the "Mr. Larrance Washington" of the parish register were one and the same individual. If any Lawrence Washington was there it must have been the father of the young lad who was to inherit Mr. Knowling's estate. What reason can be assigned for assuming that any other bearing that name was there? That would imply the presence of two Lawrence Washingtons—a needless, in fact a ridiculous assumption. And we see now why the name was entered on the parish register as Mr. He was Magister Artium.

The only possible objection to the above is conveyed in the suggestion that the husband of Amphilis may not have been alive when her stepfather's will was proved. But he was alive fifteen days before, when that will was written; for in it Mr. Knowling referred to his godson as Lawrence "the younger," which he would not have been likely to do if the lad's father was dead. I know what will be said of instances of the use of the term "junior" as an addition to a name long after the necessity for such use has passed away. But that was when two of the same name, as father and son, have been living together in the same community so long that the custom of calling one of them "junior" has grown into a fixed habit, to survive long after the death of the "senior." Who is there so credulous as to think that this may have been such a case? A boy of fourteen! Why, in all probability this was the first, as for aught we know it was the last and only, time he was ever called "the younger" in his life. The father of that boy was alive at that time, and fifteen days later was attending court in a neighbouring parish where a will of which that boy was appointed executor was then offered for probate; and while there he was—on account, perhaps, of the temporary absence of the Rev. Mr. William Davis, the regular surrogate, before whom that will was presented and allowed—himself deputed to act as surrogate for the special purpose of taking the acknowledgment of Mr. John Dagnall to a bond of guardianship of two minor children. That is the only reasonable explanation of the known facts in the case; and therefore our answer to this part of the question must be that Lawrence the surrogate was the husband of Amphillis.

Secondly: Was he, or was he not, the son of Lawrence Washington of Sulgrave and Brington, and the brother of Sir William and Sir John? What do the facts show in this respect? It has been known for years, and accepted by everybody, I believe, that the son of Lawrence of Sulgrave was M.A., Fellow of Brasenose, and rector of Purleigh. We may take that for granted. How about our man at Whethamsted? He was M.A. and acting surrogate. Was he a clergyman? This I consider the most important point in the whole discussion, and it should be most carefully considered by those who wish to make a conscientious study of this problem. My own experience, gained in the study of very many thousand English wills during the past seven years, has led me to the conclusion that the duties of surrogate in the old courts of probate in England were usually, if not invariably, performed by clergymen. As a matter of fact I cannot recall a single instance to the contrary, although I am not prepared to deny that such an instance can be adduced. At any rate, I am quite confident that all antiquaries of any experience among wills will agree with me that such was the rule. It is then, I claim, a fair and most reasonable inference that the individual performing such duties at Whethamsted was a clergyman. There can be no doubt about Mr. William Davis, whom I have referred to as "the regular surrogate," for I found that he was then holding the living of Whethamsted, where the court was held. I have as little doubt, myself, about his substitute, Mr. Lawrence Washington, who was undoubtedly called on, as a brother clergyman, to act for him during a temporary absence from court, or else because he was overcrowded with other business, and solely for the purpose of administering an oath; that was all. But on this question, which I recognized as so important, I did not trust to my own experience alone. I took pains to consult two or three gentlemen, whom I regarded as most fit, by reason of their great knowledge of the forms and customs of the old probate courts, and their long experience in the minute and critical examination of wills, to give me sound advice. I am happy to say that they fully approved of my position on this point, and agreed with me in regarding it as most probable that Lawrence Washington, the surrogate (hac vice), was therefore a clergyman. I claim, then, that Lawrence Washington, the surrogate hac vice, was the husband of Amphillis, and that he was a clergyman, and upon this claim "I stand for judgment."

If a clergyman, who then was he? Who but the parson of Purleigh? One of my critics has said that "there were several Lawrence Washingtons of that generation." While inclined to question his right to use the word "several," yet, granting such to be the fact, I must ask him whether he or anybody else can point to one Lawrence Washington of that generation who was a clergyman, besides the rector of Purleigh.

Even allowing it as not sufficiently clear that this surrogate was a clergyman, no one can deny that he was "in Artibus Magister," or, as we say, the bond." Were there "several Lawrence Washingtons of that generation" who were Masters of Arts? It would "puzzle a Philadelphia lawyer" to find them. I suppose that we are all agreed that this implies a university education. I know of but two graduates of a university of that generation then living and bearing this name, viz., Lawrence of Brasenose (1621), and his kinsman Lawrence of St. John's (1638). Can anybody mention another? Lawrence of St. John's was entered as the son of Sir Lawrence Washington, Knight, so we know who he was. It must have been one of these two who was there that day, a Master of Arts acting as surrogate. Which of them? Can any one hesitate to say which of these two it must have been? To suppose the latter (i.e., Lawrence of St. John's) is to assume that he it was who was the husband of Amphillis and the father of all those children, while all the other evidence we have about him seems to show that he had but one wife, Eleanor (Gyse), and an only child, Elizabeth, Lady Ferrars, and that his home was Garsdon, in Wiltshire—an unwarranted assumption.

Thus, even regarding the Lawrence Washington who is found to have been in court that day simply as a Master of Arts, the weight of testimony appears to be altogether in favour of its having been the Fellow of Brasenose. Add to this the fact that he was there acting as a surrogate, and the fair inference to be drawn thence that he was a clergyman, which we know the Fellow of Brasenose to have been, and surely my case must appear much stronger. The other evidence which I was fortunate enough to find corroborates this, so far as it goes. Sir Richard Anderson, lord of the manor of Pendley, whose residence and burial-place was in the parish of Tring, bequeathed in his will forty shillings to his "cousin Larrance Washington of Brasenose," and, in the very same clause, made a similar bequest to a Mr. Dagnall, a very significant name in this connexion. And Sir Edmund Verney, whose family had for generations possessed this manor of Pendley until his brother, Sir Francis, sold it to Sir Richard Anderson in 1607, was himself lord of the manor of Middle Claydon, the very home of the Roades family, to which Amphillis Washington belonged. He has been shown to have been a most intimate friend of a younger brother of Lawrence Washington of Brasenose; his will was witnessed by William Roades, probably the brother of Amphillis Washington; and the Verney papers disclose an intimate connexion between the Roades family and the Verneys. In short, none of the new evidence collected seems to weaken my theory, while some of it very distinctly strengthens it. What objection can be made to it? The only thing like an objection which I have been able to discover is the fact that three, at least, of the children of Lawrence Washington and Amphillis were baptized at Tring, in Hertfordshire, while the Fellow of Brasenose was holding the living of Purleigh, in Essex, forty or fifty miles away. I made no remark upon this in my paper, for the reason that I attempted no general discussion of the problem, but simply undertook to give in a narrative form the story of my successive discoveries and the way in which I was led up to them. It should go without saying that I thought of this as a possible objection. But to my mind it was not an insuperable one. As evidence against my theory it seemed to me to be controlled by much more weighty testimony in favour of it. The not unreasonable suggestions offered themselves that he might have been, for a time at least, a non-resident parson or a pluralist, either of which suggestions offered a sufficient explanation. The years mentioned in the baptismal register at Tring are 1635, 1636, and 1641, and these at present are the only years to be considered. Who can tell what the state of things may or may not have been in those years? Who can tell what may or may not have led Mrs. Amphillis Washington, whether with or without her husband, to have taken refuge in her stepfather's (possibly her mother's) home on those special occasions? We know little, or rather nothing, as yet about that. What we do know is that Lawrence and Amphillis were the parents of those children, and we have seen enough to make it quite evident that this Lawrence was a Master of Arts and a clergyman; and there was no other Lawrence Washington then living, to our knowledge, to whom those terms would apply but the parson of Purleigh. We have yet to learn where that "poor and miserable" living was upon which he was permitted to continue after his ejection from Purleigh in 1643. When that is found out the question as to his having been a pluralist will undoubtedly be settled, and more light probably thrown upon the whole matter.

As it is, on reviewing the case I feel that I was quite justified in declaring that "the long search after the true line of ancestry of our Washington was practically brought to a successful close when that little paper [the bond of John Dagnall before Lawrence Washington, M.A. and surrogate] was discovered on Monday, the 3rd of June, 1889." And I consider that, properly speaking, my part of the work is ended. I do not claim, nor do my plans of research allow me, to give all the time needed for exhaustive work on this, or the Harvard or the Williams problems, however fascinating they may be. As soon as I have gathered evidence enough to make a reasonably clear case, my plan is to make it public, in order that all who care to take part in the search may know where to look and what to look for. The suggestion that I would have better "waited a little longer and searched a little more" before giving to the world the result of my researches is quite contrary to the whole spirit and character of my work, and meets with no sympathy from me.

There are sundry additions yet to be made to our store of knowledge about this family—the record of marriage of Lawrence and Amphillis, which may open a new line of research; the baptisms of the other children, especially of John, the first Virginian ancestor; the will or administration of their father, which may disclose the place of that "poor and miserable" living which he was allowed to retain. All these, let us hope, will be made known sooner or later. With regard to the baptism of John, let me suggest to one of my critics that it is not needed as evidence of his existence. That we have already in the will of Mr. Knowing, and (better still) in the grant made to him of administration of the goods, &c., of his mother a year or more before his presumed migration. As to this grant I regret to have distinctly contradicted the statement of one of my critics that it was "Mr. Waters's assumption that it was he who administered to his mother Amphillis." That was no "assumption" on my part; I simply gave the record, which clearly states the fact. I have been reproached for not visiting Purleigh. After examining the Parliamentary Report about the parish registers there and taking a look into the late Col. Chester's extracts made there, I concluded that I had no time to spend in "dropping buckets into empty wells and drawing nothing up." I am told that in that case I "might have searched the bishop's transcripts." So I might if I could have laid my hands upon them. Has my critic ever seen them, or does he know anybody who has? If he will get me access to the Bishop's Transcripts for the Diocese of London I shall feel grateful to him all my life long, and that, too, not on account of the Washingtons only, but of a host of American families.

And where will he advise me to hunt for the will or administration of the Rev. Lawrence Washington, which he says "ought to be forthcoming"? Did Col. Chester find it in all the twenty years during which he had this problem in mind?

Another critic says that John and Lawrence "were young in 1657 to have families." If my theory is right they were twenty-three and twenty-two respectively in that year. What would working genealogists say to that? As it turns out, however, Lawrence did not marry until 1660, when he was twenty-five years old, and his only daughter by his first wife was born three years later, when he was twenty-eight.

That "in the lifetime of the Vicar [sic] of Purleigh a guardian was appointed over his alleged children" is true, but that this is "fatal" to my theory I do not see, for it was so ordered in order to carry out the provisions of the will, which expressly named the parties appointed, and the guardianship was evidently a trusteeship limited to that estate during the minority of the youthful executor.

My work has received the doubtful compliment, "C'est magnifique, mais ce n'est pas généalogie." I must console myself with hoping that, like the "six hundred," I shall be found, at least, to have hit the mark I aimed at, which was, not to prepare an elaborate and exhaustive family history, but to point out with reasonable probability the true line of Washington's ancestry.

HENRY F. WATRES.

Literary Gossip.

MR. DU MAURIER has finished his novel, and it will appear in Harper's Magazine next year.

MR. RUDYARD KIPLING has written a short story called 'On Greenhow Hill,' which will appear in the August Macmillan. It takes up again the adventures of the heroes in 'Soldiers Three.'

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. will publish in a few weeks a volume of 'English Lyrics,' by Mr. Alfred Austin. It will contain an introductory preface by Mr. William Watson, author of 'At Wordsworth's Grave' and other poems.

On the 19th inst. Mr. Archibald Grove proposes to bring out an enlarged and illustrated Short Cuts at a penny. The first number will contain a story by the Queen of Roumania, the commencement of a new serial by Mr. Grant Allen, and a novel by Mr. Bret Harte. Mr. Frank Gould will begin a series of cartoons with a portrait of the Prince of Wales. The halfpenny edition of Short Cuts, which has obtained an unprecedented circulation, will still continue.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER is writing a book of which he has not as yet fixed the title. It is a collection of anecdotes of Lord Beaconsfield, of which he has a large number.

MRS. PATCHETT MARTIN's collection of "Bush" stories, entitled 'Under the Gum-Tree,' will be published towards the end of the present month, and will include original stories by "Tasma," Mrs. Campbell Praed, Mr. Marriott Watson, Mr. Robert Richardson, Mr. Hume Nisbet, and others. It is somewhat remarkable that in nine cases out of ten these Australian stories are placed in the "back-blocks" of Queensland, and that the more settled parts of the continent have furnished but little material. Mr. Hume Nisbet has specially designed a cover for 'Under the Gum-Tree,' which will be published by Messrs. Trischler & Co.

WE are glad to say that a July number of the Children's Guide, of which we spoke last week, will be published, and it is hoped that the regular issue of the magazine may be resumed after the school holidays.

THE Rev. Bailey J. Harker, author of 'Rambles in Upper Wharfedale,' has in the press a new work on the scenery, antiquities, customs, and folk-lore of Grassington-in-Craven. The book will appear under the title of 'The Buxton of Yorkshire.'

IN the July number of the Contemporary Review will appear a paper recounting in full the particulars of a journey to Lhasá, the capital of Tibet, made by the learned Indian Buddhist scholar Sarat Chandra Dás. This narrative has been long suppressed—it is said, on the representations of Mr. Colman Macaulay, who deprecated affording minute geographical information of this kind to possible political rivals in Central Asia. Mr. Macaulay is now dead; and the forthcoming paper has been compiled by the writer of the article in the February number of the Contemporary on 'Philosophical Buddhism in Tibet.'

AN anonymous work—'A Dead Man's Diary, written after his Decease'—which has been appearing monthly in the English edition of Lippincott's Magazine, will be published immediately in one volume, with additional chapters, by Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co. The 'Diary' is by a writer of poems, essays, and short stories in magazines. A false claimant to the authorship has already appeared, and on the strength of his assertion obtained acceptance for a kindred narrative by a firm of publishers, who on learning that his claim was baseless have withdrawn from the arrangement, after having incurred considerable expense.

A STORY by Mr. Oscar Wilde will appear complete in Lippincott's Magazine for July, entitled 'The Picture of Dorian Gray.'

MR. THOMAS STEVENS, the author of 'Round the World on a Bicycle,' was sent out, it may be remembered, in search of Mr. Stanley by the New York World. Mr. Stevens has written an account of his adventures in a work called 'Scouting for Stanley in East Africa,' which will be published in about a fortnight by Messrs. Cassell & Co.

A CORRESPONDENT writes:—

"Your reviewer of a novel called 'Acté,' stated to be by a Mr. Westbury, has not been quite fair to your younger readers in omitting to name Alexandre Dumas sen.'s romance of 'Acté,' now before me, which has for its chief male character Nero, and Acté for its heroine, with her rival the eunuch Sporus or Sabina. St. Paul also is a prominent character. The whole is a striking if exaggerated romance, and to persons familiar with it like myself for thirty years, the announcement of a work of the same title and on the same subject, not being a translation, seems, to say the least, strange. The author of the book now reviewed has apparently set himself the somewhat daring task of equaling or eclipsing the elder Dumas."

No doubt there are coincidences between the books, but there is no real resemblance, and we should fancy Mr. Westbury never heard of Dumas's novel.

MR. WILLIAM GEORGE BLACK'S 'Folk Medicine: a Chapter in the History of Culture,' published in 1883 by the Folk-lore Society, has appeared in Spanish, being translated by Señor Dn. Antonio Machado y Alvarez. This is a compliment both to the author and to the Society. The Spanish edition contains an appendix of interesting essays suggested by Mr. Black's classification of his subject, and is very handsomely printed and got-up.

FROM the United States comes the news of the death of Miss Elizabeth Balch, who wrote 'An Author's Love,' a series of supposed replies of the Unknown to Prosper Mérimée's 'Lettres à une Inconnue'; and also that of Mr. Fletcher Harper, of the firm of Harper & Brothers, of New York. He was born in New York in 1828. He paid special attention to the periodicals issued by his house.

MESSRS. T. & T. CLARK, of Edinburgh, hope to commence next autumn the publication of a new quarterly, a critical review of current theological and philosophical literature, on the lines of Harnack and Schürer's Theologische Literatur-Zeitung. The editor will be Prof. S. D. F. Salmond, D.D. The new journal will embrace not only theological literature, but philosophical, so far as it is related to religious and theological questions. It will give a chronicle of the publications which are issued in these departments from quarter to quarter. It will notice the more important articles which appear in other magazines and journals, both home and foreign, and will review the notable books of the quarter.

THE Government of the Nizam of Hyderabad have decided to establish a public library in the capital of the province to aid a movement for translating useful English books into Urdu. They have also decided to undertake an archaeological survey throughout the province.

THE Delegates of the Clarendon Press will issue in a few days an annotated edition of Schiller's 'Jungfrau von Orleans,' by Prof. Buchheim. The volume will contain a short summary of the authentic and traditional history of the Maid of Orleans, a critical analysis showing from the history of the composition that the poet was fully justified in deviating in his drama from authentic history, and finally a complete commentary.

'FIDES IMPLICITA' is the title of a posthumous work of the distinguished theologian A. Ritschl, which will shortly be published. The treatise will discuss the subjects of 'Implicit Belief,' of 'Knowledge and Belief,' of 'Belief and the Church,' &c.

PROF. P. SCHWEITZER, the author of a 'History of Scandinavian Literature' in three volumes, which was very favourably received in Scandinavia, has just suddenly died at Vevey.

MR. W. A. CLOUSTON's long-promised introduction to John Lane's 'Continuation' of Chaucer's 'Squire's Tale' will be issued to members of the Chaucer Society in a few weeks. In the first part Mr. Clouston writes about magic horses and chariots, magic mirrors and images, magic rings, magic swords and spears, &c. The second part contains an abstract in English of the old French prose romance of 'Cléomadès et Claremonde,' followed by various versions in Eastern and Western languages. One of the Sanskrit tales—that of 'The Weaver who personated the God Vishnú'—which Mr. Clouston regards as the prototype of all stories of the flying horse, &c., has not appeared in English before, nor have the Turkish, or the two gipsy variants, or one of the Persian.

THE most interesting Parliamentary Papers of the week are a Return showing the Constitution of the Executive of each Colony, the Constitution of Assemblies, Number of Members, Number of Electors, &c. (2d.); Companies, Memorandum of Association Bill, and Companies, Winding-up Bill, Reports (3d.); and Local Taxation Returns, 1888-9, Part I. (1s.).

SCIENCE

ASTRONOMICAL LITERATURE.

Star-Land: being Talks with Young People about the Wonders of the Heavens. By Sir Robert Stawell Ball, F.R.S. (Cassell & Co.)—This elegant little book contains, in fact, the substance of two courses of lectures delivered to juvenile audiences at the Royal Institution, the last occasion at Christmastide, 1887. Few persons are so capable of putting astronomical facts together in a form likely to be attractive to young people as the Royal Astronomer of Ireland, and the lectures before us are evidently the outcome of a careful and painstaking use of this power. They abound with great wealth of illustration, original and select, making many of the marvellous details of the science as intelligible and interesting to those for whom the explanations are intended as it is, perhaps, possible to make them. We note with pleasure the great care with which the volume has been revised, for seldom have we met with one so free from casual errors. At p. 116 the author appears to give rather too great an extension to the earth's atmosphere, the limit of which probably does not much exceed one hundred miles. In the account of the early life of Sir W. Herschel, at p. 215, it is hardly fair to say he left the Hanoverian Guards because "he did not like fighting even so far as being in the band was concerned"; the fact was the state of his health at that time caused his parents to feel that he was not equal to the fatigues of campaigning. His first musical appointment in England was not (as Sir Robert Ball implies) at Bath, but in the county of Durham, after which he was organist at Halifax. Occasionally, too, the tendency to use poetical language leads to statements not quite accurate. No "conclave of classical scholars and astronomers decided" that Deimos and Phobos should be the names of the two satellites of Mars; the discoverer, Prof. Asaph Hall, used his right of giving these names, which were suggested by the Rev. H. G. Madan, of Eton. But these are small blemishes. The work before us forms a most useful and interesting first book of astronomy for young people, and will, we trust, have the large circulation it deserves.

PROF. S. P. LANGLEY sends us a copy of his Memoir on the Temperature of the Moon, as derived from researches made at the Allegheny Observatory, and recently communicated to the National Academy of Sciences at Washington. Lord Rosse, it will be remembered, was the first to obtain unquestionable evidence of the fact of radiation of heat from the moon's soil; but the subject of the determination of its approximate mean amount is an exceedingly difficult one, and is indeed, Prof. Langley remarks, "almost on the limit of our power of investigation with the present means of science." We have not space to give any account of the means by which he has here attempted to grapple with it, but must content ourselves with stating the result, which is that the mean temperature of the sunlit lunar soil is probably but little above zero Centigrade, i.e., freezing-point. Prof. Langley desires to say that the expenses (which have been very considerable) of the elaborate researches on this subject have been defrayed by the late William Thaw, of Pittsburg (recently deceased); also to acknowledge the great value of the collaboration, through every stage of the progress of the work, of Mr. F. W. Very, of the Allegheny Observatory, at which it was carried on.

We have received the numbers of the Memorie della Società degli Spettroscopisti Italiani for the first five months of the present year. They are chiefly occupied with accounts of the solar spots, facule, and other phenomena as observed at Rome and Palermo during 1889 and the first quarter of 1890. Renewal of solar activity, after a long interval of remarkable quiescence, was indicated by the appearance of a fine group of spots on the 6th of March (we may remark that this was noticed at Greenwich two days earlier close to the eastern limb of the sun) at the great mean heliographic latitude of nearly 34°.

GEOGRAPHICAL NOTES.

It is with deep regret we announce the death of Senhor Ferreira da Silva Porto, who died by his own hands (so at least it is reported) in consequence of the disasters which have overtaken the Portuguese at Bihe, in the kingdom of Angola. Silva Porto was the oldest of African explorers, having been born in 1808. It was he who met Livingstone at Linyanti in 1853 and offered to escort him to the west coast, and who, in the following year, dispatched a caravan across Africa, which safely reached Mozambique. To Mr. Arnot and the American missionaries at Bailundo this enterprising Portuguese trader proved at all times a staunch friend, and his services have been repeatedly acknowledged by them. It is not very creditable to the Portuguese Geographical Society that the whole of Silva Porto's interesting diaries should not have been published long since.

Mr. Consul H. H. Johnston reached London in the beginning of the week from Eastern Africa.

Dr. Peters has safely reached Rubaga, the former capital of Uganda, by travelling along the routes previously taken by Mr. Thomson and Bishop Hannington. Arriving on March 2nd, Dr. Peters, according to accounts which should be received with caution, defeated the Arabs, placed Mwanga on the throne, and got him to sign the usual treaty. All this is the more surprising as Dr. Peters had at most seventy men with him, only ten of whom were soldiers. Mr. Jackson, we are told, failed in pushing his way through Busoga. The German pioneer does not appear to have tarried long in Uganda, for on April 14th he had already reached Ukumi, a district to the south of the Victoria Nyanza and within five hundred miles of the coast.

The New Map of Africa, published by Messrs. Geo. Philip & Son, on a scale of 120 miles to the inch, is likely to prove useful, the information having been brought down to quite a recent date.

Mr. J. G. Bartholomew's New Map of Central Africa, on a scale of 1 : 5,600,000, embodies for the first time the authentic results of Mr. Stanley's recent explorations, in as far as these may be gathered from the "Hand-Map" distributed at the Royal Geographical Society's gathering in the Albert Hall.

Dr. F. Nansen's Arctic expedition, towards which the Norwegian Government has asked the National Assembly to contribute 280,000 fr., will proceed by the Behring's Straits route. The idea is to make use of the oceanic current which, there is good reason to believe, flows through those straits towards the Pole. In support of this theory it was mentioned at a recent sitting of the Paris Geographical Society that on the 18th of June, 1884, various articles were picked up on a floating piece of ice off Julianehaab, in Greenland, which proved to be part of the wreck of the Jeannette, which had foundered near the islands of New Siberia on the 13th of June, 1881. An interesting question arises. What was the route which this floe must have followed? M. Mohn, the well-known director of the Meteorological Office at Christiania, is of opinion that the current which had conveyed this floe across the Pole must have been tolerably direct, and Dr. Nansen hopes to be able to penetrate to a high latitude by the same route. An additional confirmation of this theory is derived from the discovery, among some driftwood at Godthaab, in Greenland, of a species of bow used for shooting birds which is altogether unknown in Greenland, but which, after being deposited in the Ethnographic Museum at Christiania, was eventually recognized as identical with a class of weapon used by the natives of Alaska, Norton Sound, and the Yukon river mouth. Dr. Nansen proposes to make use of a small wooden steamer of about 170 tons burden, with strengthened sides, and provisions, coals, and general stores sufficient to last for five years. The start will be made in February, 1892, and the expedition count on reaching Behring's Straits in the following June. Thence the ship will make for the islands of New Siberia, and on reaching these Dr. Nansen hopes that the floes will surround the vessel, and in the space of two years convey her safely across the Polar regions towards Greenland. The sides of the steamer are built at such an angle as to lessen the chance of their being crushed, but if any disaster should occur the crew will fall back on their boats and stores.

THE ROYAL OBSERVATORY, GREENWICH.

THE Annual Visitation of the Royal Observatory was held, in accordance with custom, on Saturday last, being the first in June, and the Astronomer Royal presented his usual Report to the Board, narrating the changes which have been made since the last, and describing the state of the Observatory at the date of the present, which is the 10th of May.

It is proposed to enlarge the building in the south grounds containing the Lassell reflecting telescope in such a way as to obtain greater elevation (found to be very desirable to avoid the obstructions of view caused by trees to the south) for that instrument, the room below serving for a computing room for the magnetic and meteorological department, and other rooms being added adjoining, which are much wanted for storehouses and other purposes. The 13-inch photographic refractor, with 10-inch guiding telescope by Sir H. Grubb, has lately been mounted in the new 18-foot dome over the principal computing-room, and a few trial photographs, with generally satisfactory results, taken with it. The 28-inch object-glass for the great telescope is now being figured, and will probably be ready for mounting very shortly; mean time the tube intended to carry it, which is of special construction, has been completed. Mr. Christie proposes to transfer the present 12½-inch glass, hitherto used in this telescope, to the Lassell equatorial, where it would be highly useful for the observation of comets, occultations, and casual phenomena. All the other telescopes are in good working order, and the usual system of employing them has been continued with accustomed regularity, the number of stars observed with the transit circle in the year 1889 amounting to 1,650, and special attention having been given to Victoria and Sappho amongst the small planets, as being likely to be useful (combined with observations made at the Cape) in determination of solar parallax. The completion and publication of the ten-year catalogue of stars have been already mentioned in the Athenæum. Of the moon 100 places (80 per lunation) have been obtained with the transit circle, and 63 (averaging 53 per lunation) with the altazimuth. The spectroscopic observations disclose several interesting results respecting motion of stars in the line of sight, indicating or confirming in some cases the probability of orbital motion in a stellar system. The photographic observations of the sun point to the LOAN EXHIBITION OF PICTURES.—At the Art Gallery of the Corporation of London, Guildhall, E.C. OPEN DAILY, from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m.—Admission Free.

Cathedral Cities.—Peterborough and the Abbeys of Crowland and Thorney. Drawn and etched by R. Farren. (Cambridge, Macmillan & Bowes.)

To this volume Precentor Venables has contributed an historical introduction of considerable interest, yet the chief merit of it consists in its clearness and agreeable style, as he has not much that is new and important to tell. He does not hesitate to discredit the details of those wonderful legends in the Peterborough copy of the 'Anglo-Saxon Chronicle' (c. 1122) regarding the foundation of Medehamsted, Gildenburgh, or Peterborough of a much later date, by Peada, and its extravagant endowment by Wulfhere in 664; he rejects that shameless fabrication, the confirming Bull of Pope Agatho (678-682), on which were based the convent's claims to be exempt from taxes and services of every kind, with precedence of all monasteries north of the Thames, and the privilege of standing instead of Rome as a place of pilgrimage. If Guthlac, that gruesome saint, and St. Neot did save Crowland from the Northmen, who wrecked Medehamsted and Ely, at any rate, Mr. Venables does not believe the legend in its literal form. There is no more proof of it than that the Crowlanders, going to the Fen capital, dug the bodies of its priests out of the ruins and honourably interred them. The successors of the victims were wont to point to a stone cist in their retro-choir, with the date 870 (the date given by the 'Anglo-Saxon Chronicle') in Arabic numerals (!) cut upon it, as proof of the martyrdom of one set of monks and the neighbourly kindness of the other. Of course it does not follow that because the date was in characters of a much later kind that the cist was a forgery, nor, for the matter of that, need the date have been dishonestly placed on a genuine stone coffin. That Medehamsted was destroyed in 870 by the Danes cannot be doubted.

It remained desolate for ninety-six years. The 'Chronicle' says the walls remained amid the woods, and three generations passed away before it was rebuilt by Ethelwold of Winchester, whom King Edgar's charter distinctly styles "the skilful architect of God," and thus proves not only that this great priest, Dunstan's fellow pupil, was an "indefatigable constructor of churches," as the charter otherwise calls him, but that the British workman of that period, at least, was not, as according to Mr. William Morris's theory he should have been, the architect of the square-ended cruciform church whose remains were lately disinterred beneath the south transept and crossing of Peterborough Cathedral. It savours of pedantry to doubt that the Anglo-Saxon masonry thus dug up again is a remnant of the building which stood empty and waste until Ethelwold, c. 966, set up the convent again with a body of Benedictines. Dr. Stubbs, the apologist of St. Dunstan, has related the history of his ecclesiastical policy, and it is needless to say Mr. Venables endorses his views. What concerns us mostly is that the saint was what we should now call a practising architect. What he did is another question. Whether he began anew on the old site, or, restoring the wall-plate to its original height, only replaced the wooden roof which, in 870, fell on the heads of Hedda and his monks, we cannot tell; at least it is uncertain until scientific examination of the ground within and about the existing cathedral proves the presence or absence of traces of combustion in scorched stones and charred timbers at their feet.

In a like manner we have yet to learn whether the smaller eastern limb, not long since dug out, really belonged to the same structure as the much larger and broader transepts which came to light at the same time. It seems probable that the smaller choir was older, and that Ethelwold, retaining the site of the altar, reconstructed the western portions of the building on a larger scale. That he established Benedictines there is rather in favour of this. They would be more likely to be content with a building on a smaller scale. The inquiry is the more difficult because, as usual, more than one fire devastated Medehamsted, and Hereward the Wake, by way of keeping out the Conqueror's nominee, that "very stern man" Turolf of Fécamp, burnt the monastery buildings, leaving, however, the church not much injured. This was Ethelwold's church. Even Ernulf, the abbot whom King Henry, 1114, sent for, and, "whether he would or no," as the 'Anglo-Saxon Chronicle' says, "made Bishop of Rochester, a great builder," as Canterbury and his see bear witness to this day, did nothing to the church at Medehamsted. It may therefore be concluded that domestic building absorbed the funds of Abbot Ernulf, and that his church needed little doing to it.

Mr. Venables does not give the date of the conflagration, which, if the 'Anglo-Saxon Chronicle' is to be trusted, occurred on Friday, "the second day before the Nones of August," 1116, when "the whole of the monastery of Peterborough was burnt, and all the houses, excepting the chapter house and the dormitory; and the greater part of the town was burnt also." This authority says nothing about the church, which, however, according to Hugh, the local chronicler, was destroyed, the fire lasting for nine days in the tower, doubtless a solid, four-square structure of the Norman pattern, and "very huge." What a fire in a monastery and its church meant, Mr. Venables missed an opportunity of describing when he omitted to quote Jocelyn of Brakelond's vivid record of the manner in which, on the night of St. Etheldreda, 1198, St. Edmund punished the scandalous disrespect of the keepers of his shrine at St. Edmundsbury, who had littered that holy place with rags, wax, flax, and what not, so that, the culprits falling asleep when they should have watched, "that part of a taper which had been clapt upon the other" toppled over, set the rubbish in a blaze, and, besides enormous damage, imperilled the shrine itself, and threatened the cup of St. Edmund, which was found in the debris, to the good Jocelyn's delight, quite uninjured, although its oaken case was burned to ashes. To "avoid the scandal of the thing," he says, his brethren called in a goldsmith, who instantly patched the metal of the shrine very artfully with wax. Nevertheless some pilgrims, "coming peering about very early in the morning," asked awkward questions and got lying answers.

Our author has carefully collected all the details of architectural interest concerning Peterborough, and points out that recent excavations have revealed some of Ethelwold's Saxon church, part of which Abbot Waterville removed in 1155, while part was imbedded in the west wall of the cloister, thus showing us the limits of the Saxon work on that side. Mr. Paley's acute remark on the Norman western transeptal towers is quoted, and their likeness to the stupendous towers at Exeter is not forgotten. We cannot agree with the somewhat enthusiastic estimate of the west front, which, beautiful mask as it is—one of the most beautiful in the world—is yet but a mask and out of keeping with the noble older building, in admiring the stately grace and style of which we are at one with Mr. Venables.

Mr. Farren's etchings are careful, but somewhat unscientific and heavy-handed. The best of them are neither picturesque nor simply architectural—for instance, the west front of Peterborough; the organ screen and south transept before the restoration; the west front of the nave of Crowland, and a view from the south-east of the same. The work is the second of the series. The third is yet to come. It will be welcome, especially as Mr. Farren is still improving as an etcher, and Mr. Freeman is to write the introductory chapter to it.

NEW PRINTS.

FROM the Berlin Photographic Company we have an "artist's proof" of a plate in photogravure of Sir F. Leighton's large picture (R.A. 1889) called 'Greek Girls playing at Ball,' which our readers no doubt remember. Although the middle distance is somewhat confused, and the nearer girl, who is fastening her drapery, seems a little too big, and her dress tells darker than in the picture, the plate is otherwise, and within the limits of the process employed, satisfactory. From the same firm we have received a reduced version, according to a similar process, of Mr. Alma Tadema's 'An Old Story,' two lovers seated on a marble bench. As a memorandum of a brilliant example and capital design it is acceptable. This is all, no doubt, it pretends to be. As both Sir Frederic Leighton and Mr. Tadema have signed these reproductions, it is to be supposed they are satisfied. The publishers assert that "the number of proofs of both plates is limited to 250 impressions," i.e., we presume, of each example. They cannot, surely, expect to obtain even the half of 250 "proofs" fit to be called "artists' proofs" from any plate whatever. "Artists' proofs" form only one category of "proofs," and must needs be fewer than 125. The modern, or current, so-called "proofs before letters" and "lettered proofs" are only proofs by courtesy and in trade parlance. They are not strictly, according to the code of artists and collectors, proofs at all. It is well known that when painters and engravers sign the impressions, with or without remarques, which some publishers put forth as "artists' proofs," all the artist intends is that the signed examples are good impressions of the plate in which he is interested. His signature pledges his good faith to this extent, and not to more. It is undeniable, however, that certain artists of distinction have not cared to explain themselves on this point, although they could hardly be ignorant that the public understood their guarantees in a very different sense. Warned by the decision of Tooth & Muir, our painters will now, for their own credit's sake, no doubt take care that what they do shall be in harmony with the public's ideas on the subject.

The Art Union of London has adopted for this year's issue to its subscribers an unusual, but not unique plan, and given a portfolio with eight pleasant etchings instead of a large print, of secondary merit, of a subject merely popular in the inferior sense of that term. The etchings prove to be most welcome; all of them are bright and good, two or three are pathetic, and one or two poetic enough to please anybody. 'A Bit of Old York,' by Mr. W. W. Burgess, is a very pretty view of early Georgian houses and an ancient wall, deftly etched to indicate the weathering of the stone, sunny and commendable for its tone and touch. 'A Lane in the New Forest,' by the same artist, is decidedly broad, soft, and true in its lighting and atmosphere. Mr. C. E. Holloway will increase his reputation by the bright and clear, broad and harmonious 'St. Paul's from the Thames.' The middle distance, a row of irregular houses and wharves, is treated with just sense of tone. This and similar subjects have before now excited the ambition of would-be etchers who do not possess half the taste and draughtsmanship shown before us. 'Old Chelsea Church,' by the same artist, is pleasing and acceptable on account of its veracity, simplicity, and good colour. Mr. A. Morris's 'Silver Strand' is soft, silvery, and pretty. Mr. M. W. Ridley did better things than the modest, bright, and solid 'Collier in Bristol Harbour'; but we can say, and not praise it, that it is not ambitious. Its illumination is decidedly good. Mr. P. Robinson has produced a pretty, but rather spotty and pretentious etching in 'The Bridge.' Mr. F. Slocombe's autumnal 'View on the Kennett' is bright, solid, broad, and capably drawn, with unusual firmness and accomplishment.

NOTES FROM CYPRUS.

Salamis, April 26, 1890.

AN uneventful fortnight. Work was resumed after the Easter festival on Wednesday, the 16th, but we were rather short-handed until the next week. Even then, owing to the beginning of the harvest, many of our old local workmen did not return, and have been replaced by strangers from the Carpass—a sorry substitute. Of the sites working immediately after Easter two are practically done with. The large building with massive limestone columns did not yield encouraging results, and although a little more excavation will be necessary to determine its plan, it has been, at least for the present, abandoned. Τοῦρμα ran dry two days ago. There is still a shaft following down a curious cutting in the face of the rock, but the main trench, which has produced all the best results, is exhausted, and we are now filling in the holes. The finds continued to the end to be of the same interesting character as before—scarabs, little porcelain figures, and statuettes of terracotta or limestone, with fragments of colossal statues in painted drapery. On the other hand, the Agora has been taken up again on a small scale, with the view of settling some dubious points here and there. It has given us a pretty little head from a marble statuette.

There remains the sand site by the house, on which our main forces have been concentrated. Progress has been slow, owing to the enormous depth of sand, fully twenty feet, with which we now have to contend. It is still, therefore, doubtful whether there exists any important building on the east side of the open court. The east wall, however, with the great fluted marble columns, is gradually being cleared, and several of the bases have been found, one of them supporting a large standing fragment of column. On the east side of the wall is a tessellated marble pavement, apparently well preserved, and a fragment of dark blue marble column with twisted fluting has just been uncovered. Finds of fragments of marble statues of the Roman period have been fairly frequent, and one female head, slightly under life size, is an admirable example of the best work of the time. It is a hopeful sign that the east side is the productive side of the site, and that heads are to be found there but little damaged.

We meditate an attack next week on the tombs. No fresh site in the city can well be tackled so late in the season with important work already in hand and an exhausted exchequer. But tomb-work is inexpensive and can be stopped at any moment, while the results ought certainly to be interesting, both in themselves and for comparison with those of previous explorations.

J. ARTHUR R. MUNRO.

Salamis, May 10, 1890.

OUR work has again been a good deal hampered and interrupted. Harvest is in full swing, and that means few hands and higher wages. Moreover, feasts and festivals seem to be peculiarly rife. In spite, however, of difficulties I am able again to report a very satisfactory fortnight.

One main site is now in work, that of the supposed Zeus temple in the sand. As we have had no news of further supplies, it has been necessary somewhat to contract our operations, and with a view to, in a fashion, round off, though in no sense to complete, our task, the east front wall is being thoroughly cleared down to the level of the soil. That much still remains to be done will be sufficiently apparent from the fact that the centre of the parallelogram is as yet all but untouched, that the south wall is opened only at its two eastern and western corners, that the remains beyond the limits of the colonnade wall north-east and south-east are necessarily left on one side; and even the section of the east wall, which has been so prolific of statuary, has as yet only been worked to the sand level, and the soil beneath, in which, to judge from previous digging a few weeks back, there is still plenty of spoil, has been left untouched.

Thus confined as our operations necessarily are for want of funds, we have little that is new from an architectural point of view. That the large fluted columns which I described in my last report did form the east front of the temple seems now practically certain; beyond them we have just tapped, and tapped only, a mass of later constructions high up in the sand, and beneath them there are, no doubt, older remains. Of actual finds more may be said. The fortnight opened with the uncovering of a colossal nude male torso, of late but good work, to which, apparently, belong some lower portions of a similar figure found a few days before. Since then there has been added to the list a marble statue, under life size, of the regis-bearing Athena, rendered in the usual pose, and unfortunately wanting head and arms. The work is Roman, as is also that of another female statue now nearly complete in three fragments, but with the head, as usual, wanting. Thus at one time or another in the course of the excavations quite a line of statuary has been found following the direction, but by no means preserving the limits, of the east wall. In the short section still unexcavated we may yet add to the list.

As announced in the last report sent home, we had resolved to make some trial of the tombs. Unluckily the best plots of ground are in crop, and only a patch here and there has been reaped and cleared. The first site tried proved a thorough failure; there were practically no tombs, two wretched holes scarcely deserving to be excepted. On the second site we were still baffled. As we pursued the tombs, they always fled from us; and instead, somewhat to our surprise, the ground proved literally sown with fragments of inscriptions of all dates from the beginning of the Ptolemaic period. Of building to account for the inscriptions there is little or no trace; yet in a neighbouring field to-day we opened a large blue block—a statue base—with its inscription quite sound and fresh, and such a stone cannot have moved far from its original position, for it is too heavy to be played with. Inscriptions are, indeed, just now the order of the day. Beside nearly a score of fragments, some of which are fairly long, the last four days have yielded seven fairly complete inscriptions, three of which are on a twice-used statue base found built into the eastern wall of the temple in the sand.

Thus virtually the only tomb worked is a large Roman sepulchre not far from the monastery of St. Barnabas. The villagers had already attempted to rifle it, for the shaft had fallen in, but had somehow been frightened off. The tomb is finely made—cut in the rocks—with a triple arrangement of couches on which were placed sarcophagi of terra-cotta. The contents, which are undamaged, are characteristically Roman—earrings, terra-cotta lamps and vases, glass.

The extension of our work serves to show what a wide field for excavation there still is to the west of Salamis in ground which has generally been treated hitherto as either given up to tombs, or beyond the limits of the town and its suburbs. The more one works the larger "Salamis" becomes. But we can do no more towards laying bare this "Salamis"; our funds are all but at an end, and the next week, unless the mail brings better news, will see our season closed.

H. A. TUBBS.

SALES.

MESSRS. CHRISTIE, MANSON & WOODS sold on the 7th inst. the following, from various collections. Drawings: E. Duncan, On the Loden, 73*l*. L. Haghe, St. Gomar, 63*l*. T. M. Richardson, Menaggio, Lake Como, 60*l*.; Ischia, Bay of Naples, 63*l*. J. D. Harding, Falls of the Tummel, Perthshire, 99*l*. F. W. Topham, Spanish Flower Girls, 57*l*. Sir J. Gilbert, Hotspur, Mortimer, Worcester, and Glendower, 94*l*. G. Du Maurier, The Transit of Venus, 110*l*.; The Two Thrones, 115*l*. F. Taylor, A Hawking Party, 210*l*. J. M. W. Turner, Great Malvern Abbey, 94*l*. P. Graham, Cloudland and Moor, 152*l*. B. Riviere, Comala, 409*l*. Pictures: R. Ansdell, A Moorish Well, Granada, 105*l*. R. Beavis, Towing-Path on the Saône, near Lyons, 136*l*. F. Goodall, Feeding Rabbits, 199*l*.; The Woodman's Home, 110*l*. T. S. Cooper, Cattle and Sheep, 183*l*.; A Landscape, with cattle near a shed, 320*l*. T. Creswick, A Watery Lane, 157*l*. E. Frère, La Dinette, 152*l*.; The Toy Duck, 115*l*. T. Creswick and R. Ansdell, The Park, with deer, 325*l*.; A Woody River Scene, with stag, 152*l*. H. W. B. Davis, "The Lowing Herd wanders slowly o'er the Lea," 377*l*. B. W. Leader, After Rain, an autumn evening, 483*l*.; St. Michael's Mount, Cornwall, 294*l*.; On the River Llugwy, near Capel Curig, 168*l*.; Evening among the Welsh Hills, 210*l*.; Moel Siabod from the River Llugwy, below Capel Curig, 220*l*. J. MacWhirter, A Forest Solitude, 252*l*. T. Webster, Spring-Time, 504*l*. G. D. Leslie, Benson Ferry, 294*l*. P. Graham, The Sea-Birds' Home, 493*l*.; Roaring Waters, 903*l*. F. W. W. Topham, Drawing for Military Service, modern Italy, 357*l*. B. Riviere, The King and his Satellites, 1,417*l*. J. B. Burgess, The Pastor's Visit, 115*l*. V. Cole, A Mountain Scene, with river and sheep, 105*l*. T. Faed, The School Board in the North, "What shall I write?" 304*l*. Sir J. Gilbert, "Ready," waiting for the Command, 315*l*. J. Hardy, Highland Sportsman, with pony, dogs, and game, 220*l*. J. Israëls, The First Step, 163*l*. J. Linnell, A Harvest Scene, gleaners returning, 404*l*.; A Woody River Scene, with anglers, 168*l*.; Gleaners Returning, 162*l*. Sir J. E. Millais, The Baptism of Guthren the Dane before Alfred the Great, 105*l*. J. Phillip, Measuring Recruits, 120*l.* H. Ten Kate, Rembrandt visiting the Studio of Brauwer, 105*l.*

The same auctioneers sold on the 9th inst. the following drawings, the property of the late Sir J. Heron: J. Varley, The Thames at Blackwall, 54*l.* C. Stanfield, Calais Old Pier, 99*l.* F. Taylor, The Coverley Huntsman, 57*l.* R. P. Bonington, On the Seine at Rouen, 50*l.* S. Prout, Church of St. Pierre, Caen, 152*l.* D. Cox, A Coast Scene, unloading fish from a schooner, 54*l.*; The Road across the Moor, North Wales, 63*l.*; The Timber Waggon, Sherwood Forest, 136*l.*; Skirts of the Forest, 126*l.*; A Landscape, with cattle by a river, near St. Asaph, Denbighshire, 89*l.*; View in Wales, in the foreground a man on a grey pony talking to two women, 65*l.*; The Road through the Wood, 69*l.* G. Barret, Walton Bridge, on the Thames, 157*l.* P. De Wint, A River Scene and Windmill, 126*l.*; The Farm, cattle in pond, 220*l.*; The Last of the Harvest, 50*l.*; A River Scene in Westmoreland, 105*l.*; On the Yare, 257*l.*; Stacking Hay, 252*l.* W. Müller, The Harpagus Tomb, Lycia, 105*l.* C. Fielding, A Coast Scene, under the chalk cliffs, sunset, 120*l.*; Raglan Castle, 56*l.*; A Woodland Landscape, showing castle on an eminence, cattle in foreground, 110*l.*; Fresh Breeze off Staffa, 241*l.* J. M. W. Turner, Dymchurch, 66*l.*; Corfe Castle, 50*l.*; Newport Castle, 75*l.*; A River Scene, with bridge and old buildings, 56*l.*; Evenning Priory, Glamorganshire, 108*l.*; Dunstanborough, sunrise, 136*l.*

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge sold the following coins on May 29th, from the collection of Mr. Semple: Charles I., Three-Pound Piece, Oxford Mint, 18*l.* 5*s.* Pattern Shilling, by Briot, 22*l.* George III., Pattern Half-Guinea, 1762, 15*l.* 10*s.* Five-Pound Piece, by Pistrucci, 1820, 85*l.* Two-Pound Piece, by Pistrucci, 1820, 18*l.* William IV., Pattern Crown, by Wyon, 1831, 16*l.* 5*s.* Victoria Five-Pound Piece, by Wyon, 1839, 25*l.* Pattern Quarter Sovereign, 1853, 19*l.* 10*s.* Charles I., Oxford Pound Piece, 1642, 18*l.* Pattern Half-Guinea, 1728, 19*l.* 10*s.* Charles I., Gold Medal, by N. Briot, 1633, on his return to London after being crowned in Edinburgh, 13*l.*

The sales at Paris have of late been heavy. The collection of the late M. Rothan, the diplomatist, comprising a number of valuable Dutch works, a few Spanish pictures, and a good many specimens of the French school of the last century, was sold at the end of last month. A few Guardis and Canalettos were the only Italian pictures. The collection realized over a million of francs. The Mey Collection, comprising, besides portraits attributed to Hals, Holbein, Terburg, and other masters, a number of fine pictures and drawings of modern French artists, has since been dispersed.

Fine-Art Gossip.

MR. HOLMAN HUNT's design called 'Christ Jesus in the Temple,' recently at the exhibition of the Society of Painters in Water Colours, which was intended as a cartoon to be worked out in mosaic, has now been reproduced in that mode, and the completed picture, which is destined for the chapel of Clifton College, is for a short time on view at Messrs. Powell's Whitefriars Glass Works, near the Temple, London. As we described the design when it was in Pall Mall, all we need say now is that the reproduction has been successfully carried out.

At 95A, Regent Street, may be seen a picture entitled 'Tired of Life,' by Heer E. Neide. The Dudley Gallery Art Society has appointed to-day (Saturday) for the private view, and Monday next for the public opening, of its Summer Exhibition of Water-Colour Drawings. Messrs. Boussod, Valadon & Co. will exhibit from Monday next a series of marine paintings by the well-known Russian artist Ivan Aivazovsky. The collection of pictures on loan formed in the new gallery, Guildhall, London, is now open for public inspection.

THE French journals record the death on the 3rd inst. of M. P. Burty, who was born in Paris in 1830, became a pupil of M. Chabaldussurage as a painter, and made his début as an art critic in the Gazette des Beaux-Arts, to which he contributed many biographies of artists and catalogues of their works. He assisted to prepare various catalogues of important exhibitions; in 1878 he published the first edition of the correspondence of Delacroix, and in 1880 a second series of the same; with much ability he represented La Presse, La Liberté, and Le Courrier Artistique, and in London he published catalogues of the etchings of Mr. Seymour Haden and Méryon. In 1866 he published 'Chefs-d'Œuvre des Arts Industriels,' Paris, with 200 cuts. As one of the few French art critics who have vouchsafed to recognize anything like design in this country, he is entitled to our grateful remembrance.

MR. STILLMAN writes:—

"The just-issued number of the Ephemeris of the Archaeological Society of Athens contains the record of one of the most surprising and interesting discoveries in the archaeology of Greek art which has been made in this century, in the report of Mr. Tsoudas on the excavation of the tomb near Sparta, supposed to belong to the prehistoric city of Pharis, and of which I had the privilege of giving, I believe, the first notice in the Times of October 10th of last year. The tomb as a whole is of the very highest interest, as being a royal tomb of an epoch which cannot be later than the eighth century B.C., and is by the thoroughly competent judgment of the discoverer estimated as most probably two centuries anterior to that date. At all events, it goes into the Homeric days, and the contents had never been disturbed. But the astounding revelation, which indeed makes a revolution in our ideas of Greek art, is in a pair of gold cups, ornamented in repoussé work with cattle subjects in a masterly style of design, and with a knowledge of nature which no archaic Greek work known to us hitherto approaches. The illustrations of the paper render the compositions perfectly, and I take the liberty of calling the attention of students of antique art to them as likely to compel us to rearrange our theories on the subject of the sources from which Greek art was derived. They enable us to understand as never before the descriptions of decorated objects in Homer. Few of your readers comparatively will see them very soon, if ever, and all will be glad to know that the reproductions in the Ephemeris are of extreme fidelity, and it is to be hoped that, in view of their importance, the Greek authorities will allow them to be reproduced in electrotype for the principal museums. The problems which these reliefs present for the archaeologist are not even to be roughly stated at once, so much do they antagonize with all previous discoveries. I take the liberty of calling attention to the differences between the design of these cups, and that in the engraved cuirass from Olympia which I discovered some years ago, and which is considered the earliest work of its kind then known, but which was by no archaeologist dated earlier than the sixth century B.C. It was published in the Bulletin of the French School at Athens."

AMONGST the sepulchral stelæ, bearing inscriptions and sculptures in relief, recently found at the Piræus, is one inscribed to a certain Secunda Servilia, daughter of Publius, married to an Athenian. The deceased is represented seated and clothed in the chiton poderes and himation, and before her stands a little girl holding in her left hand a box closed, and in her right a fan, she also being clothed with the chiton poderes, over which is the epibema.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—'Lucia,' 'Die Meistersinger,' 'Les Huguenots,' 'Lohengrin.'
ST. JAMES'S HALL.—Philharmonic Concerts. Madame Sophie Meuter's Recital. M. Paderewski's Orchestral Concert.

For the sake of record it should be stated that Donizetti's once popular opera 'Lucia di Lammermoor' was performed on Friday last week, with Madame Melba, Signor Ravelli, and Signor Palermini in the principal parts. The Australian prima donna has greatly improved since she first appeared here, and rendered the ridiculous mad scena brilliantly; but the baritone sang painfully out of tune.

A surprisingly fine performance of 'Die Meistersinger' was given on Saturday. The predictions that Wagner's comic opera could not be effectively rendered in Italian have all been falsified by the result, and when we read in the Berlin journals that a recent revival in the capital of the German Empire was so execrable that the management was implored not to repeat it, we have reason to be gratified with the achievement at Covent Garden carried out by an English impresario and a company of various nationalities. The Walther of M. Jean de Reszke and the Hans Sachs of M. Lassalle are simply incomparable, and the rest of the performers were worthy to associate with them. Madame Tavery as Eva again proved herself a thorough artist. She sang the music and acted the part admirably, and in appearance alone was there anything left to desire. M. Isnardon's Beckmesser has much improved, and is exceedingly humorous without exaggeration. M. Montariol is again excellent as David and Signor Abramoff as Pogner. M. Winogradoff as Kothner and Mlle. Bauermeister as Magdalena complete a cast that certainly could not be approached in any continental theatre. The chorus and stage arrangements are first rate, and if Signor Mancinelli would pay a little more attention to the details of the orchestration the performance would be without flaw.

'Les Huguenots' was repeated on Monday with an improved cast, Madame Nordica and M. Lassalle resuming the parts of Valentine and St. Bris respectively. Signor Ravelli was vocally excellent as Raoul, and M. Winogradoff competent as Nevers.—The assumption of Elsa in 'Lohengrin' by Madame Melba on Tuesday was, on the whole, a success. That she looked well and vocalized the music to perfection may be taken for granted. There was a little self-consciousness in her manner, but this may have been due to nervousness, as it wore off as the performance proceeded. The indulgence which was asked on behalf of M. Jean de Reszke was only needed in the second act. In the third his voice seemed to have recovered its normal power and beauty.

The directors of the Philharmonic Society seem to be singularly oblivious of what takes place in the musical world outside their own domain. Again and again works are announced as for the first time in England which have been performed elsewhere. This was the case with Bach's Concerto in G for strings, which headed the programme of the concert on Thursday last week, for the work has certainly been heard at least twice at the Crystal Palace. It is one of a set of six composed in 1721 for the Margrave of Brandenburg, a munificent patron of music. Spitta says of this concerto that "it is throughout instinct with life and genius. One passage is as fine as anything in the whole realm of German instrumental music." It is certainly a marvel of construction, and notwithstanding the intricacy of the polyphonic details almost as clear and easy to follow as a concerto of Handel. Of M. Moritz Moszkowski's Second Suite in G minor for orchestra, performed under the composer's direction, it will be desirable to speak with caution. It is one of the Russian composer's most recent works, and the present was its second performance. It is in six more or less elaborate movements, the most important being the second, a fugue of large dimension, freely constructed, but full of polyphonic details, and framed on subject-matter evidently intended to recall the style of Bach and others of the contrapuntal school. A largetto in B flat may be mentioned as showing the composer in the light of a melodist; but here again there is much skilful polyphonic writing. Of the six movements a bright and piquant intermezzo in D is the most pleasing at a first hearing, and the final march apparently the weakest, notwithstanding the very elaborate scoring. The suite shows the capacity of M. Moszkowski to handle large forms with ease, and though not strikingly original, it is the work of a highly cultured musician. Of the rest of the concert it is unnecessary to speak at length. Signor Buonamici, a Florentine pianist who has not appeared frequently in London, played Beethoven's Concerto in E flat in what may be termed an Italian manner. That is to say, the touch and tone were charming, but the conception lacked breadth and dignity. Mr. Max Heinrich in Schubert's 'Die Allmacht' and Miss Lena Little in Berlioz's 'Le Captif' sang very expressively. The duets by Mr. Goring Thomas, announced as for the first time of performance, were sung at the Popular Concerts last season. Sir Arthur Sullivan's Overture to 'Macbeth' and Meyerbeer's to 'Struensee' completed the programme.

The indulgence of the audience was asked on behalf of Madame Sophie Menter at her recital on Monday afternoon, on the ground that she had broken a finger-nail, but it was not needed. On the contrary, the Austrian pianist showed herself more of an artist and less of a virtuoso than usual. She played a Prelude and Fugue of Bach and three of Scarlatti's pieces with much power and brilliancy and without a trace of exaggeration, and her reading of Beethoven's Sonata in E, Op. 109, was in all respects commendable, if not striking. With the exception of four items by Chopin, which did not show her to so much advantage, the rest of the programme was of the ultra-modern school, and included a number of Liszt's transcriptions of Schubert and his extraordinary arrangement of the Overture to 'Tannhäuser,' which is one of Madame Menter's favourite show pieces.

M. Paderewski gave an orchestral concert on Tuesday evening, which at a less busy time would have commanded a large amount of attention. We have yet to learn how the Polish pianist can interpret the concertos of the great masters, the principal item in this programme being a work from his own pen. It is in A minor, and is in the customary three movements, though in construction a sense of freedom is shown, which, however, scarcely amounts to licence. The first movement is the best, the themes being fresh and having more weight and character than the other parts of the work. The slow movement, a romanza, is rather discursive, but full of delicate touches, and it was much applauded. Slavonic character permeates the finale, but the themes are trivial and it is decidedly the weakest part of the work. As a whole the concerto may be described as exceedingly clever and brilliantly written, both for the piano and the orchestra, but it is in no sense a great work. Later in the programme M. Paderewski played Saint-Saëns's Concerto in C minor, No. 4, and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, of which he gave an extraordinary performance. The orchestra under Mr. Henschel introduced a suite by a French composer named Le Borne. It has for text words taken from Ecclesiastes, where the Preacher speaks of his former indulgence in the pleasures of this world, and its proper title would be "suite de ballet." It is essentially French music of the lighter sort, that is to say, pretty, fanciful, and trivial.

Musical Gossip.

THE third of Messrs. Max Heinrich and Schönberger's recitals took place at the Steinway Hall on Friday last week. The vocalist rendered in his usual artistic and expressive manner half a dozen Lieder by Schubert and four by Mr. Schönberger, the latter proving to be clever songs, especially one entitled 'Leichtes Blut.' The pianist, who has much improved, gave a very effective performance of Beethoven's 'Sonata Appassionata,' and was also heard to great advantage in pieces by Brahms and Jensen.

THE annual concert of the London Academy of Music, founded by the late Dr. Wyld, was given in St. James's Hall on Thursday last week. The academy is now under the management of three of the professors, and appears to be in a flourishing condition. Though some of the students were scarcely equal to the works set down for them, the average of proficiency was very creditable. Mr. A. Pollitzer conducted the concert.

THE concert of the Handel Society at the Portman Rooms on the same evening unfortunately clashed with that of the Philharmonic Society, and we can only record that the works in the programme were Handel's Chandos Anthem "Let God arise," Goetz's 137th Psalm, Schubert's Symphony in C, and Beethoven's music to 'The Ruins of Athens.' This interesting and ambitious programme was under the direction of Mr. F. A. W. Docker.

THE first of the current series of Señor Sarasate's concerts, which took place last Saturday afternoon, may be briefly dismissed. It consisted entirely of piano and violin music, the concert-giver being assisted, as on previous occasions of this kind, by Madame Berthe Marx. The concert works in the programme were Raff's Sonata in E minor, No. 1 (not a very inspired work); Schubert's Fantasia in C, Op. 159; and a Concertstück by Saint-Saëns, Op. 20. Finer ensemble playing could not be desired, the performance of Schubert's lovely work being especially good. Madame Marx played some solos in a manner that does not call for comment.

ON the same afternoon Mlle. Kleeberg gave the first of two pianoforte recitals at the Princes' Hall, and pleased a large audience by her highly refined and finished interpretation of Handel's Suite in G minor, Schumann's 'Kinderscenen,' Beethoven's 'Variations,' Op. 35 (an admirable performance), and lesser items.

AN agreeable concert was given by the Lombard Amateur Musical Society at the Princes' Hall last Saturday evening in aid of the endowment fund of the Prendergast Home for Ladies. Male-voice part-singing forms the principal work of the society, and under the direction of Mr. A. H. D. Prendergast the performing members have attained a high degree of proficiency, singing glees and part-songs with refinement and intelligence. They were assisted on the present occasion by Mrs. Hutchinson, Mr. F. Peachey, jun. (pianist), and Mr. Prosper Burnett (violinist).

THE Richter programme on Monday was wholly made up of familiar music. Wagner was represented by the "Charfreitagszauber" from 'Parsifal,' the introduction to the third act of 'Die Meistersinger,' and the 'Walkürenritt.' To these well-worn pieces were added Beethoven's 'Egmont' Overture, Berlioz's 'Le Carnaval Romain,' and Brahms's Symphony in E minor. To criticize such a scheme would be superfluous.

THE principal items in the second of Messrs. Ludwig and Whitehouse's chamber concerts, which took place at the Prince's Hall on Tuesday, were Dvorák's Quartet in D minor, Op. 23, and Schubert's in D minor, erroneously described as Op. 161, this being the number of the G major Quartet. The concert-givers were assisted by Miss Olga Néruda, Mr. A. Gibson, and Miss Margaret Hoare.

THE pianoforte recital of Madame Roger-Miclos at the Princes' Hall on Tuesday afternoon was so well attended as to indicate that the public is not even yet tired of this form of entertainment. The performer, who is no stranger in London, displayed excellent technique in various minor pieces by Handel, Schubert, Henselt, and Liszt, her best performance being the last-named composer's Rhapsodie, No. 12. Her Chopin playing left the hearer cold, though her execution of the hackneyed Polonaise in A flat was brilliant and even powerful. A careful and conscientious performance of Beethoven's 'Kreutzer' Sonata was given by Madame Roger-Miclos and M. Johannes Wolff.

INTEREST was given to the concert of Miss Fanny Davies on Wednesday afternoon at the Princes' Hall by the performance of several compositions by Madame Schumann. It cannot be said, however, that the Trio in G minor, Op. 17, from the pen of the gifted pianist, has much intrinsic value. It is unpretentious, and therefore it does not offend, but that is all. A selection of three Lieder may be more highly commended. One of them, "Der Mond kommt still gegangen," is a very pleasing song. Miss Davies gave an exquisite performance of Schumann's 'Kreisleriana,' showing herself thoroughly in sympathy with the music. The artists who assisted her were Herr Straus, Signor Piatti, and Miss Fillunger.

CONCERNING the performances of 'Joan,' a comic opera, at the Opéra Comique Theatre during the present week little need be said. Mr. Ernest Ford's music is fluent and pleasing, and with a better subject the young composer might do well. The performers were amateurs, and the purpose was to benefit a charity.

REFERENCE to the list of concerts, &c., in last week's Athenæum will show that upwards of fifty performances were announced for this week. Many high class entertainments must, therefore, pass unnoticed, and we cannot help thinking that the business of concert-giving is being overdone this season.

MR. FRANGCON DAVIES has been engaged to create the leading baritone part in Sir Arthur Sullivan's new serious opera 'Ivanhoe.'

THE Cardiff Ladies' Choir, accompanied by twenty Welsh pianists, under the conductorship of Mrs. Clara Novello Davies, and assisted by Madame Amy Sherwin, Mr. Frangcon Davies, Mr. Hirwen Jones, M. Johannes Wolff, and Barrett, will give a concert at St. James's Hall, July 2nd, at eight o'clock, in aid of the Morfa Colliery Explosion Fund.

FAVOURABLE reports are to hand of the performances of Mr. Valentine Smith's English Opera Company in Hamburg, although the w fashio

N° 3
AR
the c theat
The c place
Neum place
A Buch
cala.
A the E intere season on De
So nounc amon prod
Mon.
—
Tues.
—
—
—
Wed.
—
—
Thurs.
—
Fri.
—
Sat.
—
—
—
COM
By J.
HER
Actes.
Lyc
in Fou
August
A tran essen
MM
Carr
veus duce tem piec
Eng
ing its p is di unst offer a po is w piec with Hav
brig
Ven
and T a str
de S
'Le are sequ less yon teria

the works given are regarded at home as old-fashioned.

ARRANGEMENTS are said to be advancing for the erection and maintenance of a Wagner theatre at Berlin, modelled on that at Bayreuth. The direction of the establishment would be placed in the hands of Messrs. Hans von Bülow, Neumann, and Wolff. Little credence is to be placed in reports of this kind.

A MUSICAL journal has been started at Bucharest under the title of La Romania Musicala.

A SUBVENTION of 4,000*l.* has been granted by the Egyptian Government to M. Clemente, the intendant of the Cairo Theatre, for an opera season of three or four months, commencing on December 1st next.

SOME remarkable operatic revivals are announced at the Sannazzaro Theatre in Naples, among them being Piccinni's 'La Cecchina,' produced in 1760, and Balfe's 'Bohemian Girl.'

CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK.

- MON. Royal Academy of Music Concert, 3, St. James's Hall.
 — Miss Amy Flood-Porter's Violoncello Recital, 8, Steinway Hall.
 — Richter Concert, 8.30, St. James's Hall.
 — Royal Italian Opera, 'Le Prophète.'
 TUES. Mr. Charles F. Riddle's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Steinway Hall.
 — Madame Carreno's Pianoforte Recital, 3, St. James's Hall.
 — Miss Emmie Finney's Vocal Recital, 8.30, Fortman Rooms.
 — Hampstead Conservatoire Concert, 8.30.
 — The Musical Guild, 8.30, Kensington Town Hall.
 — Mr. Herbert Webster's Concert, 8.30, Princes' Hall.
 — Royal Italian Opera.
 WED. Madame Haas's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Steinway Hall.
 — Concert in Aid of St. Saviour's Mission, 3, Princes' Hall.
 — Mr. Charles Schliker's Concert, 8, Steinway Hall.
 — Musical Artists' Society, 8, Princes' Hall.
 — Royal Italian Opera.
 THURS. Mr. J. M. Capel's Concert, 8.30, Steinway Hall.
 — Miss Lella Dufour's Concert, 8.30, Lyric Club.
 — Royal Italian Opera.
 FRI. Miss Maude V. White's Concert, 8.30, Princes' Hall.
 — Herr Lehmann's Concert, 8, Steinway Hall.
 — Royal Italian Opera.
 SAT. Special Performance of Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul,' 3, Crystal Palace.
 — Señor Samart's Concert, 3, St. James's Hall.
 — Señor Albeniz's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Steinway Hall.
 — London Organ School Students' Concert, 8, Princes' Hall.
 — Royal Italian Opera.

DRAMA

THE WEEK.

COMEDY.—'Nerves,' a Farceical Comedy in Three Acts. By J. Comyns Carr.
 HER MAJESTY'S.—'Paris Fin de Siècle,' Pièce en Cinq Actes. Par E. Blum et R. Toché.
 LYCEUM.—'Casting the Boomerang,' an Eccentric Comedy in Four Acts. From the German of Franz von Schonthan by Augustin Daly.

As much success as is to be expected in transferring to the English stage pieces so essentially Parisian as the recent plays of MM. Blum and Toché attended Mr. Comyns Carr's adaptation of 'Les Femmes Nerveuses' of these writers. Originally produced at the Gymnase Dramatique on September 20th, 1888, this rather extravagant piece of pleasantry was introduced to the English public at the Royalty in the following March. In its English dress it retains its power to amuse, and much of the dialogue is diverting. Still some of the difficulties are unsurmountable, and the proposition of an offended husband to box a supposed rival is a poor substitute for a duel. The ending, too, is weak, a defect inherent in this class of piece. The whole, however, was received with laughter and applause. Mr. O. H. Hawtrej and Miss Maude Millett play with brightness in the central characters, and Miss Venne, Miss Lydia Cowell, Mr. H. Kemble, and Mr. Righton are seen in comic rôles.

The pieces of MM. Blum and Toché have a strong family resemblance, and 'Paris Fin de Siècle' is scarcely to be distinguished from 'Les Femmes Nerveuses.' The women in both are the same madcap, irresponsible, inconsequent creatures, who through pure thoughtlessness compromise themselves almost beyond redemption. Not in the least characteristic of the epoch are the women MM.

Blum and Toché depict. They are almost as old as comedy. The scene between Melantha and Palamede with which the second act of Dryden's 'Marriage à la Mode' opens might, but for the language, have come out of 'Paris Fin de Siècle,' and Melantha herself is in some respects scarcely distinguishable from the Marquise de Boissy-Godet. As feminine nature itself remains unchangeable, it is scarcely just to urge further the complaint that the portraiture is the same. The charge, moreover, amounts only to this, that the title of the play is too ambitious. For the rest, in their latest production our authors show women restless instead of nervous. Once more they begin well, continue indifferently, and close their piece at will. So far as their moral extends it consists of an arraignment of the fin de siècle. The only creature not thoroughly contemptible is a Breton gentleman who hates Paris and its ways, and in the close takes the wife whom he wins as a dubious blessing to live with him in his château in the west, where on fête days all the world, according to Parisian description, "s'en va au pardon, bras dessus, bras dessous, et on danse des rondes autour d'un dolmen, comme dans la closerie des Genêts." The piece is thoroughly amusing, however, and the caricature of Parisian frivolity creates constant hilarity. Some slight measure of truth underlies the satire that while the ladies of the crisi monde do their best to pass for cocottes, the cocotte fin de siècle is a stickler for respectability. A good deal of the irony of the authors hits the mark, though much of it is too grim to allow of comment. A scene descriptive of a rehearsal at the Théâtre Libre is as risky as it can well be. So subtle, however, is the delicacy as to be scarcely definable. The words seem almost modest, and it is the actresses, Madame Desclauzas especially, who give them a significance at which Madame Chaumont might blush. M. Noblet plays with much finish and style; and MM. Paul Plan, Lagrange, and Burguet, and Mesdames Sisos, Depoix, Demarsy, Varly, and other members of the company supply an interpretation which, though conventional and artificial in more than one respect, is skilful.

'Casting the Boomerang' is a trivial and not particularly interesting piece, which furnishes good opportunities for Mr. Daly's clever company. It is naturally a moral boomerang that is thrown. A handful of wild oats injudiciously sown in late life brings a rueful harvest to the sower. So well, however, and with so much spirit do the actors play into each other's hands, and so competent are Miss Ada Rehan, Mrs. Gilbert, Mr. Drew, and Mr. Lewis, that the whole proves stimulating. Nothing new is done by any of these actors; but the old is good enough to amuse and delight.

Dramatic Gossip.

No fewer than three London theatres closed on Saturday last. Drury Lane, at which 'Paul Kauvar' failed, as might be expected, to hold its own, comes first; an unexpected relapse in health on the part of Mrs. Langtry led to the temporary closure of the St. James's; and 'The Barrister' has been withdrawn from the Royalty, in order that the stage may be devoted to the rehearsals of 'The Solicitor,' which is promised on the 28th inst.

THE St. James's will shortly reopen, under the management of Mr. Arthur Bouchier, with a farceical comedy by Mr. Justin Huntley McCarthy and 'Old Friends,' a one-act piece, by Lady Greville, which will be played by Miss Edith Chester and Mr. Gilbert Farquhar.

Or three pieces produced at an afternoon representation last week at the Vaudeville, 'A Buried Talent,' a three-act play of Mr. Louis N. Parker, alone possesses much interest. It is fairly fresh and original, the subject being an incident in the life of a musician, whose opera is stolen and produced by a pupil. Mrs. P. Campbell created a favourable impression as the heroine, and Mr. Bassett Roe and Mr. Ben Greet were also received with favour. 'In Olden Days' is a slight episode of the war between Cavaliers and Roundheads, by Mr. and Mrs. (?) Hodgson. 'Picking up the Pieces,' by Mr. Julian Sturgis, a duologue, was competently played by Mrs. Onslow and Mr. Greet.

THE arrangements for the benefit performance in aid of the funds of the Marlowe Memorial are nearly complete. The performance will take place at the Shaftesbury Theatre on July 4th. M. Richepin has written a poem on Marlowe which Madame Sarah Bernhardt will recite. Mr. Willard will appear in a new comedy by Mr. H. A. Jones. Mr. Arthur Bouchier will take the leading rôle in Mr. W. L. Courtney's 'Death of Marlowe,' a little play which was lately published in the Universal Review. The Daly Company has promised its assistance; and a new duologue by Mr. J. H. McCarthy, entitled 'The Vanity of Vanities,' will be given by Miss May Whitty and Mr. Herbert Waring.

In the revival at the Lyric of 'The Bride of Love' of Mr. Robert Buchanan, Miss Ada Cavendish as Aphrodite, Miss Harriett Jay as Psyche, and Mr. T. B. Thalberg as Eros resume their original characters. Mr. Ernest Hendrie is Zephyros; Miss Laura Linden, Eridon; and Miss Luna, Euphrosyne. 'By the Sea,' Mr. Alec Nelson's rendering of 'Jean Marie,' is also given.

MR. SIDNEY LEE's monograph on Stratford-on-Avon, which first appeared nearly six years ago, will be reissued immediately in a cheaper edition by Messrs. Seeley & Co. Mr. Lee has taken advantage of the republication to make some additions to his chapters on the Stratford Guild, on Charlecote, and on the controversy respecting enclosures in which Shakspeare was involved in his last days.

MR. WM. HEINEMANN is going to publish Archdeacon Farrar's impressions of the Passion play at Ober-Ammergau.

IBSEN's 'Ghosts' ('Les Revenants') has just been acted, with great success, at the Théâtre-Libre. The translation follows the original closely. The piece was adequately mounted and admirably played, M. Antoine, who took the part of Oswald, giving a singularly fine rendering of the character. The director of the Théâtre-Libre, who is at present obliged to give his performances as matinées at a hired theatre, has announced his intention of opening a Théâtre-Libre, literally free to every one, en plein boulevard. The company is to be formed on strictly democratic principles; the actors' names are not to be announced, and the parts are to be taken in rotation by all the actors.

THE newly erected Madison Square Garden Theatre in New York will open in September with Mr. Hamilton Aid's 'Dr. Bill,' at present holding possession of the Avenue.

PROF. F. A. LEO has thrown out a bone of contention to Shakspearean scholars by the publication of an elegantly got-up little volume containing the autographs of Rosenkrantz and Guildenstern, which he discovered in a "princely" album in the Stuttgart Library. The autograph of "Jörgen Rossenkrantz," inscribed in the album in 1577, figures underneath the legend, "In utraque fortuna ipsius fortunæ esto memor"; whilst "P. Guildenstern" entered his name under the resigned saying, "Ferendum est sperandum."

NEXT WEEK'S NOVELTIES AND REVIVALS.

TUES. Globe (Evening), Reopening, 'Romeo and Juliet.'
(These announcements are subject to changes of plan on the part of managers.)

MISCELLANEA

Horsebread.—Reading some remarks in one of your late numbers respecting the word "Horsebrede" recalled to my mind that many years ago, when travelling in the north of France and in Flanders by cabriolet, it was the regular practice of the drivers to carry with them some brown cakes—about $\frac{3}{4}$ in. thick, about 15 in. long, 6 in. or 7 in. broad, and oblong—with which to feed the horse when stopping on the road, and the houses of entertainment always had those cakes ready if required. They were crisp, but not hard like ship biscuits.

BLIGH PEACOCK.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—L. L.—S. G. P.—F. G. H.—A. H.—W. D. W.—received.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION BY POST.

	s.	d.
For Twelve Months	...	15 3
For Six Months	...	7 8

THE UNIVERSAL REVIEW.

JUNE 14th, 1890, price 2s. 6d.

Contents.

1. MARRIAGE, MORALITY, and CHRISTIANITY: a Reply to Critics of 'The Krutzer Sonata.' By Count Leon Tolstoi.
 2. THE ART of ENGLAND.—THE ACADEMY, the GROSVENOR, and the NEW GALLERY. (Fully Illustrated.) Harry Quilter.
 3. THE TRUMPET of FAME. H. D. Trail.
 4. THE RIVAL SALONS.—I. SALON des CHAMPS ÉLYSÉES. (Fully Illustrated.) Emily Crawford.
 5. PROCERIS. (Illustrated.) Graham R. Tomson.
 6. THE DEADLOCK in DARWINISM. Samuel Butler.
 7. A VILLA at TIVOLI. Professor Verrill.
 8. UNPUBLISHED MSS. of the POET COWPER. Mrs. D'Arcy Collyer.
 9. THE WAGES of SIN. (Illustrated.) Lucas Malet.
 10. THE WORLD in JUNE. The Editor.
- Illustrations.*
- "ENONE." From Original Pencil Sketch by G. A. Storey, A.R.A.
LOUIS XI. in the VILLAGER'S COTTAGE. Seymour Lucas, A.R.A.
"THE CONVERSION OF ST. HUBERT." Arthur Lemon.
"THE TRIUMPH OF SAUL and DAVID." T. M. Rook.
"SATURDAY NIGHT at the SAVAGE CLUB." W. H. Bartlett.
VENETIAN FRUITSELLERS on the GIUDECCA. Henry Woods, A.R.A.
"HOW LISA LOVED the KING." Blair Leighton.
From Original Sketches—
STUDY of a WOMAN. R. Collier.
Le REVE (ZOLA). A. de Richemont.
FACSIMILE of MS. of an ORIGINAL POEM by COWPER.
THE WAGES of SIN.
"She went back to the easel," &c. A. Sacherverel-Cope.
Frontispiece—"THE CITY FOUNTAIN." Dorothy Tennant.
With Facsimiles of many other Original Sketches by J. MacWhirter, A.R.A., Denny Sackler, Philip Morris, A.R.A., B. W. Leader, A.R.A., Georges Laucé, Lionel Smythe, A. Hacker, Morot Veret, Ernest Waterlow, A.R.A., E. Onslow Ford, A.R.A., Walter Duncan.
Initials by C. A. Channer.
Swan Sonnenschein & Co.

ANGLO-AUSTRIA: an English Magazine for Austria-Hungary. No. 6. Price Tenpence.

Contents for JUNE.

- THE AUSTRO-HUNGARIAN MONARCHY.
VALLIER the FISHERMAN. I. Favre.
SABBATH MORN. Harlingford North.
ENGLISH PRESS on the CONTINENT. W. Lodia.
ART GOSSIP. A. H. Wheeler.
NOT SINCE HEARD OF. Hoy Trindes.
INDEPENDENT THOUGHTS on EVOLUTION. F. A. Malleon.
ARCHDUCHESS MARIE VALERIE. Ida Schreiber.
TYROLESE LEGENDS. M. A. Courten.
FRANCIS GRILLPARZER. Dr. J. Schenk.
LITERARY and SCIENTIFIC NOTES. B. Richardson.

Published at Meran, Tyrol.

London Agent: W. Norman Brown, 45, Flanders-road, Bedford Park, W.

STREET ARCHITECTURE in LIVERPOOL.—See the BUILDER of June 14th (4d. by post 4d.; Annual Subscription, 10s.) for View of the British and Foreign Marine Insurance Company's New Offices, Liverpool—Salisbury Chantry, Christ Church (measured drawings)—Industrial Schools, Knowle, &c.—Office, 46, Catherine-street, London, W.C.

MR. MURRAY'S LIST OF NEW WORKS.

SPEECHES DELIVERED in INDIA, 1884–88. By the MARQUIS OF DUFFERIN. 8vo. 9s.

A NATURALIST'S VOYAGE ROUND the WORLD in H.M.S. BEAGLE. By CHARLES DARWIN, F.R.S. With Maps and 100 Views of the Places Visited, from Sketches taken on the Spot, by R. T. FRITCHETT. Medium 8vo. 21s.

. The object of this edition is to aid the author's descriptions by actual representations of the most interesting places and objects of Natural History referred to in them. This has been effected by securing the service of an artist who has visited the countries which Darwin describes.

. Also the Author's Popular Edition of the above work. With Portrait. Post 8vo. 3s. 6d.

The RAILWAYS of AMERICA. Their Construction, Development, Management, and Appliances. With an Introduction by THOMAS M. COOLEY. With 200 Illustrations. Large 8vo. 31s. 6d.

The RAILWAYS of ENGLAND. By W. M. ACWORTH. Fourth Edition. With 50 Illustrations. 8vo. 14s.

The RAILWAYS of SCOTLAND. Their present position, with a Glance at their Past, and a Forecast of their Future. By W. M. ACWORTH. With a Map. Crown 8vo. 5s.

OUR VICEREGAL LIFE in INDIA; during the Years 1884–1888. By the MARCHIONESS OF DUFFERIN. Fourth Edition. Portrait and Map. 2 vols. crown 8vo. 24s.

LUX MUNDI: a Series of Studies in the Religion of the Incarnation. By Various Writers. Edited by CHARLES GORE, M.A., Principal of Pusey House, Oxford. Seventh Edition. 8vo. 14s.

The VIKING AGE: the Early History, Manners, and Customs of the Ancestors of the English-speaking Nations. Illustrated from the Antiquities discovered in Mounds, Cairns, and Bogs, as well as from the Ancient Sagas and Eddas. By PAUL B. DU CHAILLU. With 1,300 Illustrations. 2 vols. medium 8vo. 42s.

"Mr. Du Chailly has confined his researches to the ascertainment of the origin of one section of mankind—the English. His belief is that historians and ethnologists, together with popular tradition, have all been flagrantly at fault in the source to which they have ascribed it. It will cheerfully be granted that he is doing excellent service by revealing in its proper proportions a specific and remarkable phase of national culture."—Times.

An ACCOUNT of FOUR YEARS' TRAVELS in AUSTRALIA, and of CAMP LIFE AMONG the SAVAGES of QUEENSLAND. By CARL LUMHOLTZ, M.A. Maps and 120 Illustrations. Medium 8vo. 24s.

"It would be hardly possible to praise too highly the manner in which Mr. Lumholtz has recorded his experiences. In every part of his narrative he displays a remarkable power of keen and accurate observation, and he presents his facts in a style at once so fresh and simple, that from beginning to end the reader's interest is maintained."—Nature.

NORTH CELEBES: a Narrative of Travels in Minahassa, the Sangir and Talaut Islands. With Notices of the Fauna, Flora, and Ethnology. By Dr. SYDNEY J. HICKSON. Map and Illustrations. 8vo. 16s.

"Dr. Hickson's volume is full of fresh information on a region of great interest. The author's first object in making this journey was to study corals, a subject which is at present exciting great interest among men of science, while his book tells us much of the bewildering life of these tropical islands, of the countless forms that inhabit the shore waters, and of the exhaustless extent of the forests."—Times.

The CRUISE of the MARCHESA to KAMSCHATKA and NEW GUINEA. With Notices of the Islands of the Malay Archipelago. By F. H. H. GUILLEMARD, M.A. With Maps and Illustrations. Medium 8vo. 21s.

"Here is a work of which British enterprise, British art, and science may well be proud, for all three have combined in the production of a book of travel in some respect unrivalled in the rich record of British exploration. Certainly the illustrations have never been excelled and seldom equalled for accuracy and artistic finish. The text of this delightful work—a joy alike to naturalist, traveller, and to the ordinary reader—is quite worthy of its splendid embellishments."—Academy.

ADVENTURES in the GREAT FOREST of EQUATORIAL AFRICA, and the COUNTRY of the DWARFS. By PAUL DU CHAILLU. Popular Edition. With 90 Illustrations. Post 8vo. 7s. 6d.

"Mr. Du Chailly's reputation as an accurate observer has long been established; and whenever he speaks his remarks are listened to with the respect due to a veteran explorer. No writer of travels could wish for a more complete success than to have composed a work which the experts at first regarded as a romance and were afterwards compelled to receive as a standard authority. This popular edition of his African travels will tax even Mr. Stanley's powers to produce a more exciting narrative than the older explorer's story."—St. James's Gazette.

The LIFE, WORKS, and LETTERS of ALEXANDER POPE, including many Original Pieces and 400 Letters now First Published. Edited, with Notes, by CROKER, ELWIN, and COURTHOPE. With Portraits and Index. 10 vols. 8vo. 10s. 6d. each.

"This excellent edition of Pope supersedes all its predecessors, and to a study of Pope's life and works is absolutely indispensable. All that is valuable in the notes of previous editors is preserved. The new Prefaces and Notes contain an extraordinary amount of information, much of which appears for the first time."—Edinburgh Review.

"Though the life and works of the poet will still continue to be the battle-ground of students of English literature, no combatant can regard himself as adequately equipped for the contest who has not studied the suggestive criticism both of Pope's poetry and character which is contained in the concluding volume of this monumental edition."—Quarterly Review.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle-street.

SATURDAY, JUNE 21, 1890.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
FRAGMENTS OF KEATS	793
TENNIS	794
THE RECORDS OF STIRLING	795
FOUR YOUNG POETS	796
A NEW SCHOOL HISTORY	797
NOVELS OF THE WEEK	797
OUR LIBRARY TABLE—LIST OF NEW BOOKS	798-799
THE SPRINGS OF FONTANA; AMERICAN COPYRIGHT; THE SUMMER PUBLISHING SEASON; 'BLUNDERS AND FORGERIES'; SALES; DAY TRAINING COLLEGES UNDER THE NEW CODE	799-801
LITERARY GOSSIP	801
SCIENCE—EVOLUTION AND BIOLOGY; ASTRONOMICAL NOTES; ANTHROPOLOGICAL NOTES; SOCIETIES; MEETINGS; GOSSIP	803-805
FINE ARTS—RECENT PUBLICATIONS; THE CARLSLE GEMS; NEW PRINTS; EXCAVATIONS AT MEGALOPOLIS; SALES; GOSSIP	805-808
MUSIC—THE WEEK; GOSSIP; CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK	809-810
DRAMA—THE WEEK; GOSSIP; NEXT WEEK'S NOVELTIES	810

LITERATURE

Poetry and Prose by John Keats: a Book of Fresh Verses and New Readings. Edited by H. Buxton Forman, and forming a Supplement to the Library Edition of Keats's Works. (Reeves & Turner.)

SINCE the publication in 1883 of Mr. Forman's edition of Keats's works—an admirable and at that time exhaustive edition—various new materials bearing upon the subject have come to light. "Of that edition," says Mr. Forman, "a reissue has been recently called for"; but he rightly holds that "to those who possess copies of the original edition it will be advantageous to have in the form of a supplement all the new material, whether in verse or in prose, and the details of all fresh collations of text which it has been possible to make." Hence the volume of some two hundred pages which now comes before us for review. In some of the details the 'Life of Keats' by Mr. Colvin and an article published in a magazine by the same gentleman have forestalled Mr. Forman's work, yet a very large proportion of them are new to all readers; and in the case of a writer so pre-eminent as Keats, whatever is new is also interesting.

The section named "Fresh Verses and New Readings" occupies forty-two pages of Mr. Forman's volume. 'Lamia' figures rather largely in this section, but various other poems have their share. Perhaps the most attractive novelty here is the concluding line of 'Hyperion.' That fragmentary poem, as published, ends, it will be remembered, with the words,—

At length
Apollo shriek'd—and lo, from all his limbs Celestial.....;

but it now appears that Keats had originally completed the final line thus:—

Celestial glory dawn'd: he was a god!

Of actual fresh verse only one item of any length is forthcoming. It consists of ninety-six lines in five-foot couplets, and is extracted from the letter which Keats wrote to his brother and sister—in law in America, in February to May, 1819. This is a skit about a fairy, or enchanted princess, her mule who is a transformed king, and her dwarf, fool, and ape, who are transformed princes; it purports to form the end of canto 12 and beginning of canto 13, but may be surmised to be, in fact, a mere unconnected improvisation, testifying to high spirits and the gift of versifying, if to little more. For literary or inventive value it might pair off with most portions of 'The Cap and Bells.'

After the section of verse come three prose articles written and published by Keats, but hitherto unidentified. They consist of a review of Hamilton Reynolds's burlesque ballad of 'Peter Bell'; a critique on an acted tragedy, 'Retribution'; or, the Chieftain's Daughter'; and another critique on an acted pantomime of 'Don Giovanni.' Not one of these prose articles is noticeably good; indeed, the second and third are but poor affairs, while the first is slight enough. About the 'Peter Bell' review there is a point of adventitious interest, namely, that, published as it was in the Examiner, it was the article which started Shelley upon the concoction of his 'Peter Bell the Third.'

We next come to the section headed "Fresh Letters and Additional Passages," considerably the longest division of the volume, and the most important. The sources of this section are indicated in the following remarks by Mr. Forman:—

"Since the publication of the library edition of Keats's Works in 1883, there has been an American issue of Lord Houghton's edition of the poetry, together with a volume of letters, superintended by Mr. J. G. Speed, who, being a grandson of George Keats, has had access to some of the papers formerly preserved at Louisville in Kentucky, and has been enabled to publish one new letter of considerable interest as well as to give several passages omitted from previous printed versions of Keats's letters. Later, Prof. Sidney Colvin contributed to the 'English Men of Letters' series an admirable volume on Keats, which, though based in the main upon previous publications, had the advantage of some fresh material. Notably Mr. Colvin had complete access to Lord Houghton's papers and to some manuscript books of Keats's friend Richard Woodhouse; and such writings of Keats as have been preserved in these records, but not used in Mr. Colvin's volume, he has kindly communicated to me,—allowing me also to use the autographs of Letters LVI, LXX, LXXXIV and LXXXVI, which have been placed in his care since his book came out. By means of the present Supplement I am adding to my edition all new material that is of consequence."

The chief point of interest brought out by this new matter is the decided dislike with which Keats, commencing at a date long prior to his death in 1821, viewed Leigh Hunt. The fact, as such, was already known; it was very clearly set forth in two letters by George Keats dated in 1824 and 1828; but the statements of the poet himself, now forthcoming, are so marked as almost to amount to a new feature in his biography. We cannot call it an agreeable feature; it shows—what was sufficiently in evidence already—that Keats was liable to conceive pets and piques against his friends, and to overlook, under the influence of those feelings, the substantial reasons which he had for regarding them cordially and even gratefully. Hunt certainly was not without his faults, either as a man or as a writer; but his relation to Keats appears to have been always one of kindly comradeship, and he evinced a desire to uphold and advance Keats's reputation and interests, even if it is admitted that he did not publicly champion the author of 'Endymion' with any extreme and self-compromising zeal. We shall extract the principal passages of Keats's letters reflecting upon Hunt, and leave the reader to judge of the spirit in which they are written; the earliest extract belongs to October, 1817, and the last comes towards the beginning of 1819.

"From No. 19 I went to Hunt's and Haydon's who live now neighbours—Shelley was there—I know nothing about anything in this part of the world—everybody seems at Loggerheads. There's Hunt infatuated—there's Haydon's picture in statu quo—There's Hunt walks up and down his painting room—criticising every head most unmercifully. There's Horace Smith tired of Hunt. 'The web of our life is of mingled yarn.'..... I am quite disgusted with literary men and will never know another except Wordsworth—no not even Byron. Here is an instance of the friendship of such, Haydon and Hunt have known each other many years—now they live—pour ainsi dire, jealous neighbours—Haydon says to me, Keats, don't show your lines to Hunt on any Account or he will have done half for you—so it appears Hunt wishes it to be thought. When he met Reynolds in the Theatre, John told him that I was getting on to the completion of 4000 lines—Ah! says Hunt, had it not been for me they would have been 7000! If he will say this to Reynolds, what would he to other people?"

"Hunt keeps on in his old way—I am completely tired of it all. He has lately published a Pocket Book called the literary Pocket-Book—full of the most sickening stuff you can imagine. Reynolds is well—he has become an Edinburgh Reviewer..... Brown and I were taken by Hunt to Novello's—there we were devastated and excruciated with bad and repeated puns. Brown don't want to go again."

"Hunt has asked me to meet Tom Moore some day—so you shall hear of him. The Night we went to Novello's there was a complete set to of Mozart and punning. I was so completely tired of it that if I were to follow my own inclinations I should never meet any one of that set again, not even Hunt who is certainly a pleasant fellow in the main when you are with him—but in reality he is vain, egotistical, and disgusting in matters of taste and in morals. He understands many a beautiful thing; but then, instead of giving other minds credit for the same degree of perception as he himself professes—he begins an explanation in such a curious manner that our taste and self-love is offended continually. Hunt does one harm by making fine things petty and beautiful things hateful. Through him I am indifferent to Mozart, I care not for white Busto—and many a glorious thing when associated with him becomes a nothing. This distort's one's mind—makes one's thoughts bizarre—perplexes one in the standard of Beauty."

"I shall insinuate some of these Creatures into a Comedy some day—and perhaps have Hunt among them.—Scene, a little Parlour—Enter Hunt—Gattie—Hazlitt—Mrs. Novello—Ollier. Gattie:—'Ha! Hunt got into your new house? Ha! Mrs. Novello: seen Altam and his wife? Mrs. N. Yes (with a grin): it's Mr. Hunt's isn't it? Gattie: Hunt's? no, ha! Mr. Ollier I congratulate you upon the highest compliment I ever heard paid to the Book. Mr. Hazlitt, I hope you are well. Hazlitt:—Yes Sir, no Sir—Mr. Hunt (at the Music) 'La Biondina' &c.—Hazlitt, did you ever hear this?—'La Biondina' &c. Hazlitt:—O no Sir—I never—Ollier:—Do Hunt give it us over again—divine—Gattie: divino—Hunt when does your Pocket-Book come out—Hunt:—'What is this absorbs me quite?'"

Another friend of Keats, whom he had hitherto appeared to esteem highly, was Mr. Benjamin Bailey, afterwards Archdeacon of Colombo; but now we find, in a letter towards February, 1819, that "no doubt his conduct has been very bad" in relation to some matrimonial vacillations.

It appears from this volume that Keats was at one time extremely fond of snuff, but by January, 1819, he had practically relinquished it. This small detail had not, we think, been hitherto on record.

Keats's correspondence as heretofore published contains many acute and luminous thoughts admirably expressed—mingled, it is true, with not a little that is trivial and puerile. When jocularity is the aim there is sometimes genuine humour. Yet many of his efforts are forced, tasteless, and abortive. The same holds good with the present volume. A new letter (September, 1817), beginning on p. 69, is a string of mere nonsense—unintelligible, or rather unmeaning, and provoking to look at. At the opposite end of the scale comes the ensuing extract, dated in the spring of 1819, from a letter to Mr. and Mrs. George Keats. We can only give the opening portion of the speculation:—

"I have been reading lately two very different books, Robertson's America and Voltaire's Siecle de Louis xiv. It is like walking arm and arm between Pizarro and the great little Monarch. In how lamentable a case do we see the great body of the people in both instances; in the first when Men might seem to inherit quiet of Mind from unsophisticated senses; from uncontamination of civilization and especially from their being as it were estranged from the mutual helps of Society and its mutual injuries—and thereby more immediately under the Protection of Providence—even there they had mortal pains to bear as bad, or even worse than Ba[iliff], Debts and Poverities of civilized Life. The whole appears to resolve into this—that Man is originally a poor forked creature subject to the same mischances as the beasts of the forest, destined to hardships and disquietude of some kind or other. If he improves by degrees his bodily accommodations and comforts—at each stage, at each ascent" [we suggest to Mr. Forman that this word ought to be "ascent"] "there are waiting for him a fresh set of annoyances—he is mortal and there is still a heaven with its stars above his head. The most interesting question that can come before us is, How far by the persevering endeavours of a seldom appearing Socrates Mankind may be made happy—I can imagine such happiness carried to an extreme—but what must it end in?—Death—and who could in such a case bear with death—the whole troubles of life which are now frittered away in a series of years, would the[n] be accumulated for the last days of a being who instead of hailing its approach would leave this world as Eve left Paradise. But in truth I do not at all believe in this sort of perfectibility—the nature of the world will not admit of it—the inhabitants of the world will correspond to itself. Let the fish Philosophise the ice away from the Rivers in winter time and they shall be at continual play in the tepid delight of summer. Look at the Poles and at the Sands of Africa, whirlpools and volcanoes. Let men exterminate them and I will say that they may arrive at earthly Happiness. The point at which Man may arrive is as far as the parallel state in inanimate nature and no further. For instance suppose a rose to have sensation, it blooms on a beautiful morning, it enjoys itself, but then comes a cold wind, a hot sun—it cannot escape it, it cannot destroy its annoyances—they are as native to the world as itself—no more can man be happy in spite, the worldly elements will prey upon his nature. The common cognomen of this world among the misguided and superstitious is 'a vale of tears' from which we are to be redeemed by a certain arbitrary interposition of God and taken to Heaven. What a little circumscribed straightened [sic] notion! Call the world if you please 'The vale of Soul-making.' Then you will find out the use of the world (I am speaking now in the highest terms for human nature admitting it to be immortal which I will here take for granted for the purpose of showing a thought which has struck me concerning it) I say 'Soul making'—Soul as distinguished from an Intelligence. There may be intelligences or sparks of the divinity in millions—but they are not Souls till they acquire identities, till each one is personally itself. Intelligences are atoms of perception—they know and they see and they are pure, in short they are God.—How then are Souls to be made? How then are these sparks which are God to have identity given them—so as ever to possess a bliss peculiar to each one's individual existence? How but by the medium of a world like this? This point I sincerely wish to consider because I think it a grander system of salvation than the christian religion—or rather it is a system of spirit creation. This is effected by three grand materials acting the one upon the other for a series of years. These three materials are the Intelligence the human heart (as distinguished from intelligence or Mind) and the World or Elemental space suited for the proper action of Mind and Heart on each other for the purpose of forming the Soul or Intelligence destined to possess the sense of Identity. I can scarcely express what I but dimly perceive."

This highly interesting volume is edited with all Mr. Forman's scrupulous care and exactness (always laudable, if sometimes excessive), which will not so much as allow him to put a full stop after Keats's signature to a letter, unless the original is in fact so punctuated. On p. 134 the word printed "instructive" should apparently be instinctive; and a remark which Mr. Forman makes on p. 127 concerning Keats's lyric 'Sharing Eve's Apple,' for which he suggests 1819 as a possible date, must have been written in forgetfulness of the fact, proved by himself at p. 87, that the verses cannot be of date later than January 31st, 1818. As frontispiece there is a fine photointaglio from a portrait by Severn of Keats's friend John Hamilton Reynolds; and as dedication some very pleasant and neatly turned verses addressed by Mr. Forman to his daughter. We have once more to thank this gentleman for a true literary service excellently performed.

Badminton Library.—Tennis, Lawn Tennis, Rackets, and Fives. By J. M. and C. J. Heathcote, E. O. Pleydell-Bouverie, and A. C. Ainger. (Longmans & Co.)

THE chapters on tennis in the Badminton volume are mainly written by Mr. J. M. Heathcote, who for more than twenty years was admittedly the best amateur player in the world. This position he gained and held not so much by decided superiority of physique or accuracy of eye as by thoughtful and scientific study of tennis. Possessing in a high degree a natural aptitude for games of this character, his special devotion to tennis led him not only to acquire great skill himself, but to bring to bear on this particular game an amount of trained intelligence which has made the results of his observation invaluable to other players. Mr. Heathcote's writing contains, therefore, not only information on matters of fact, but also much advice and reflection, some of which, perhaps, only he could give.

His style is simple, clear, and pleasant, he has at command several apt quotations, and he gives many reminiscences of incidents and personal traits which are full of interest and humour. These chapters are, as any account of tennis must be, full of detail, which to the uninitiated may prove tedious, out of proportion to the general interest of the subject, and troublesome to understand. Those, however, who are really fond of any game or of any sport know what it is to have an appetite for detail which is never satisfied, and have felt what Mr. Goschen once called "a passionate love of statistics," which seems never to flag. No one can hope to master the intricacies of tennis, still less to catch the enthusiasm, merely by reading about it; but everybody who happens to read such statistics as the analysis of "straight forces" on p. 92 must be impressed by the keenness of the interest which has induced a looker-on to subject himself to the prolonged and sustained strain of accurately observing every ball struck in a long series of matches. Tennis will never win general popularity; the accommodation for lookers-on is unfortunately very limited; and, though the game is neither so expensive nor so difficult as is sometimes supposed, it does require some money, some leisure, and careful teaching and practice. On the other hand, it fascinates and retains the interest of those who have played it. Accuracy, power of stroke, and knowledge may up to at least forty-five years of age compensate for loss of activity, and a man may continue to play with satisfaction to himself and to an active opponent till he is many years older. Let any young man with leisure and independence go into the "dedans" of a tennis court while a good match is going on, and he will see there a keenness and an excitement shared to the full by many who have passed the threshold of old age, and he will, at any rate, be convinced, even if he himself does not understand the game, that there belongs to it an enthusiasm which does not depend solely on personal success, which, on the contrary, seems to gain strength as age increases, and that, therefore, it is well worth his while to try whether it is in his nature to acquire it. The gratitude always felt and often expressed by the older spectators to any two players who have given a good exhibition of the game is most touching, and surely the interest which inspires it is a pleasure worth having.

The first chapter in this book is occupied with an investigation into the origin of games with a ball, in which, as in some other antiquarian studies, the degree of certainty arrived at seems to be in inverse proportion to the amount of pains taken in the research. With reference specially to the history of tennis, we are told that the derivation of the name can only be guessed at, that the game began in some form in France during the thirteenth century, and that the first English court was built by Henry VIII. at Hampton Court about 1526. During the latter half of the eighteenth century little interest was taken in tennis, and many of the existing courts were pulled down; but within the last thirty years a great revival has taken place, several new courts have been built, and this volume gives ample evidence of the care with which the progress of the game and the proficiency of the best players are being put on record. In the second chapter there are full instructions as to how the best courts are to be built. This is contributed by Mr. W. C. Marshall, who writes with the double authority both of a tennis player and an architect. The practical interest taken in this by private individuals may, perhaps, be somewhat discouraged by the last paragraph, which is as follows:—

Cost.—The expense of building varies greatly with time and place, but the cost of a well-appointed tennis court, exclusive of dressing rooms or any accommodation for a marker, may be roughly stated at 2,000*l.*"

Add to this the wages of a skilled marker, who is absolutely necessary, and it will easily be inferred that the luxury of a private tennis court costs its owner not less than 150*l.* a year. Compare this with "a lawn, a racket, a soft ball, a net, a pot of paint, and an active member of either sex," which are all that Mr. Lyttelton declares to be necessary for lawn tennis, and it will be easily understood why the accounts of the championship match last month between Pettitt and Saunders persistently appeared in some provincial newspapers under the heading of "Lawn Tennis," causing thereby bewilderment or indignation to the partisans of either game.

Little, indeed, can be added to Mr. Heathcote's "Reflections and Hints." Perhaps he might have told us how often, in his opinion, a good sound racket will bear restringing without loss of power, and by doing so have saved the pocket of players less cool and accurate than himself, who do not know when to lay the blame for ineffective strokes on themselves and when on the old racket, which served them once so well, but seems now to have lost its elasticity. Like most masters of the game, he allows but little scope to luck; they consider it unworthy of tennis to be interfered with by anything so unscientific as chance; but for all that days will occur to the memory of most young players when eye and arm and legs were in perfect condition, when the power of returning balls seemed quite up to the mark, but somehow no ball ever found its way to a winning opening. On such occasions old tennis players never mention the word "luck"; they only say that the opponent is playing with "success," pronouncing the word with a mysterious emphasis intended to enhance the dignity of the game. We must not forget to mention that there are several photographs of Pettitt, Saunders, Mr. Lyttelton, and Mr. Heathcote, which are most successful in giving a true impression of the attitude of each player while making some of his favourite strokes. Especially interesting, too, is the account of Barre, the great tennis player, whose name is only a tradition to the younger generation. He seems to have possessed a not unpleasant and quite justifiable confidence in his own play, and to have had also, what is much more rare, a natural fund of genial humour, of which Mr. Heathcote gives some specimens. Scarcely enough is made of the extraordinary powers of the present champion, T. Pettitt. These are so great that he has been enabled to defy rules and science, and to beat C. Saunders, a strong player with a faultless style. Apart altogether from any special interest in tennis, it is worth anybody's while to see Pettitt play. His power of concentrating his strength in a moment on any point is unequalled. It is this that enables him to "force" for the "dedans," often from most difficult positions, with greater swiftness and yet with greater precision than any other player. His activity, quickness, and correctness of eye are certainly unsurpassed, yet all his movements are characterized by such apparent ease that it is often difficult to believe that he is really exerting himself to the full. It is no doubt true that there is almost unlimited scope for knowledge and judgment at tennis, and that much of what is laid down by great authorities as to the advantage of a correct style and heavy cut holds good; but, after all, each player is the best judge of himself. After a few years' experience the chances are that he will follow the line of least resistance, and adopt a style of play which is well adapted to make the most of his own powers.

Great interest will be felt in the few pages written by Mr. Lyttelton on the relation of tennis to other games. He has been so successful at cricket, racquets, and tennis, and he has owed so much pleasure to them all, that he is too loyal to each one of them to discuss their merits separately. All are good; "cricket lies at the root of most good games, and youth without good games is gloomier than age without whist." Mr. Lyttelton does not tell us why this is so; perhaps it is beyond the scope of the "Badminton Library," or perhaps it is impossible. A gentleman of great literary ability once told a young sportsman that it was the easiest thing in the world to account for the keenness for sport; "it is," said he, "nothing more than the desire for success." It is hardly necessary to add that the gentleman in question had never shot, or fished, or ridden, or played games—had never felt, perhaps never could feel, the subtle pleasure of watching the swift low curve of a heavily-cut tennis ball. Some measure of success there must be to complete enjoyment; but to set great store by it, to stake one's all upon victory, is indeed to give "hostages to fortune." The more the personal element is eliminated the purer does the pleasure become, the fewer checks does it receive, and the longer does it last. The tendency of the age is to become analytical; perhaps there will yet be developed somebody with a zest for sport or for games who will be able to disentangle the threads of his own emotions, and tell the world what he feels, and why. Enough for the present to say that Mr. Lyttelton is well known to be a great enthusiast for games; in his opinion the art of playing well is an extremely simple one: it is only to hit the ball at the right time and in the right way. The second rule may be taught; the first cannot be acquired by everybody, and never except by practice. Sound eyesight, great intelligence, and plenty of experience are in themselves no guarantee.

"Most ladies believe that a ball struck horizontally over a net will bound off the ground vertically as if it had been dropped straight from the skies.....Many statesmen and almost all lawyers shoot not in front of, but straight at a bird flying across or over them."

No doubt Mr. Lyttelton is right, the thing is simple, but he is also right to add that to some people it is simply impossible. We can only hope that those who are gifted by nature with the necessary sympathy of limb and eye will cultivate those powers, and draw freely on this fund of pure recreation; and that to others less fortunate there may yet be given that appreciation of excellence which may enable them to find in the "dedans" of the tennis court not only rest for their limbs, but that detaching and absorbing interest which from time to time is necessary to physical and mental well-being.

Extracts from Records of the Royal Burgh of Stirling, 1667-1752. (Glasgow, privately printed.)

THIS volume, for which we are indebted to the enterprise of the Glasgow, Stirlingshire, and Sons of the Rock Society, brings to a close the series of extracts from the burghal records of Stirling of which the earlier volumes have already been noticed in our columns. We gather that the extracts here given have again been selected and arranged by Mr. Renwick, though it is not so stated on the title-page. In addition to the Council Minutes from 1667 to 1752, he has drawn upon some other records, including the extant burgh accounts, 1634-1752, the Protocol Book, 1469-1484, entries of charters, &c., 1544-1587, and the Guildry Records, 1592-1747.

The period covered by these sources of information, though it might, for an average English town, have been comparatively uneventful, was full of stirring episodes for the burgh and fortress of Stirling. The clang of arms resounds throughout the book, and what with war and rumours of war, the unfortunate burghers must have passed through a sorely troublous time. The environment and occupation of Stirling by "the Inglishes" in 1651, the calling out of the militia against the "phanaticks" in 1679 and the "rebellis" in 1683-4, the assembling of troops against the "Heilanders" in 1689, "ane designed invasion of French and Irish papists" in 1692, and the rumour of "a formidable and cruel invasion from France" in 1698—all these occur before the close of the seventeenth century; while in the eighteenth the rebellions of 1715 and 1745-6 prolonged the restlessness of the country. In this last rising Stirling found itself called on to play a somewhat prominent part. After their retreat from England, the Highlanders moved on Stirling from Glasgow, and the king's troops, retreating before them, left Blakeney to defend the castle with his garrison of regulars and four hundred Stirling militiamen. On the 4th of January (1746) the prince's army was before the town, and on the 8th the gates were thrown open. But the siege of the castle was feebly conducted, and Blakeney was relieved on the 1st of February. The aspersions on the conduct of the burghal authorities, and their indignant defence, are here given in full. The sympathies of the townsfolk, from first to last, appear to have been upon the Whig side.

But the allusions to political events are of less special interest than those extracts which illustrate the state of society and internal life of a Scottish burgh from a century and a half to two centuries ago. Perhaps the most striking peculiarity to an English mind is the theoretical element so distinctive of the national character. Entries relating to the burgh ministers teem in these records. The minister was "called" by the magistrates and town council, the call being first ratified by the three "severall incorporations," namely, the "gildrie" convened by the dean of gild, the trades by the deacon convener, and the "maltmen, mechanicks, and omnigatherum" by the baillies. The three ministers whom Stirling eventually possessed were paid out of the burgh revenues, as were also the expenses of the Communion. In 1703 there is a case of an unqualified minister being committed to prison by the baillie for preaching, the baillie's action being ratified by the town council. In spite of the reputation of Scotchmen for poverty and thrift, the stipends paid at Stirling were liberal. In the matter of education the care taken for the local grammar school and the salary of the master and his assistant were creditable to the royal burgh. It must not, however, be supposed that the worthy townsfolk had no expenses of an opposite character. The complaints of "cursing, swearing, Sabbath-breaking, and other gross immoralities," with the institution of courts for the suppression of these offences, and "of sin and profanitie in this burgh," which usher in the eighteenth century, may be partly traced to the wave of morality that spread over the country at the time, but may also point to a laxity of manners encouraged by the frequent presence of a rough and licentious soldiery. The amount of entertainment required for these troops and their commanders cannot fail to strike every reader of these records—spirits, sack, wine, ale, and beer figure largely in the town's accounts. The "town's statutes" could not be revised without the assistance of "seck, brandie, sugar, ale, tobacco, pyps," &c.; magistrates drank to officers, and officers drank to the king. Whether it were Dutch William's birthday, or whether he had triumphed gloriously over the foes of the Protestant religion, there were some "eleven dussone of beire glasses broken at ane solemnitie att the crosse." In the midst of all this toasting and feasting we come upon the one touching entry: "Item to the prisoners in the theiff's hole qwhen they wer cryeing of want." The savage treatment of criminals at the time is, indeed, too evident in these pages. The "staffman"—who acted also as hangman—was kept well employed. Culprits were whipped through the town, scourged and branded at the "troan"—exposed, if women, to the ignominy of the "cock stool" or the torture of its sister the "brank." The stocks or "jogs" were in regular use, and the thumb-screws kept in repair. One unfortunate offender was transported in fetters to America, while a payment "for ropes to bind the Egyptians" (1655) has a quite Scriptural appearance. A female sinner was "cowed in the head" (deprived of her hair) in public, while so late as 1722 a wretched woman was bound to the pillory, where her ear was hacked off with a penknife!

The burgesses were by no means without their amusements. The council arranged in 1706 for "ane horse race as also ane foot race" with "ane goose race to be ryden for by the maltmen." The horse race was run on the highway out and back, the prize being "ane fyne saddle and furnitur." Archery also was notably patronized by the burgh authorities. The local "gentlemen archers" petitioned, in 1676, that their sport was decaying, and that "other royall burrowes were rediveiving the same againe," with the result that the council gave an annual prize worth 24*l.* Scots. For merriment also the burgh had its public drummer and piper, the latter enjoying the monopoly of "playing to all penny brydellis." A "violner" also wore its livery. The youth of the town were taught "to sing and play" at a school established for the purpose, and the solidarité of this, as of other old communities, is no less manifest in its corporate merrymaking than in its care for religion or for trade. In this last department we have several allusions to the ill-fated Darien scheme, and to the investments made by the Stirling "corporations" in its stock; while the enterprising burghers were even ready to supply "cash to a Lord in Africa."

The arrangement and selection of these extracts are deserving of all praise. According to the preface, "the book possesses, in a greater degree than is usually found, in similar works, the eloquence of correct punctuation." More to the purpose, however, than this quaint recommendation is its possession of an elaborate and intelligent index, a carefully compiled glossary, lists of all burghal officers, tables of corporate revenues, and an excellent map of Stirling, circa 1700, compiled from authentic sources.

Primavera: Poems by Four Authors. (Oxford, Blackwell.)

'PRIMAVERA: POEMS BY FOUR AUTHORS,' is a title suggesting a most alarming bulk for a volume so numerously fathered. But it is one of the tiniest modest booklets that ever adventured into a world of critics. Sixteen poems, and not a long one among them, are all that these reticent four authors have elected to display as flowers of their springtime. Their reticence is wise, for it leaves the critic in the unusual and agreeable condition of wishing the collection were longer. The book, small as it is, is worthy of serious attention, for there is not one of the authors who does not show at least some poetic promise and so much general literary promise as betokens a future that should not be without note.

It is simplest to take the contributors to 'Primavera' in the order of their first poems in it. Mr. Stephen Phillips begins with an unnamed poem which does duty as a sort of prologue: "No Muse will I invoke; for she is fled!" he says, and gives a really beautiful description of the old-world muse of poetry who "dream'd of Gods in Tempe's golden air," the forlorn nymph who must not be called into our modern garish daylight. 'Orestes' is a good monologue presentment of the reminiscent tenderness of the avenging son and his pain and self-pity after the matricide which he still regards as his solemn duty and his destiny, but which, now that it is accomplished and his mother's crimes against his father have been expiated by her death, has left him her stricken mourner. The psychological idea of this poem is a true one, and it is worked out with due tenderness. The blank verse is good: 'To a Lost Love' is a gracefully sorrowful little lyric, and is musical. The last of this writer's contributions we must quote, we like it so well for its combination of lightness and deeper meaning:—

A DREAM.

My dead love came to me, and said,
"God gives me one hour's rest,
To spend with thee on earth again:
How shall we spend it best?"

"Why, as of old," I said; and so
We quarrell'd, as of old:
But, when I turn'd to make my peace,
That one short hour was told.

Altogether Mr. Phillips gives in his share of 'Primavera' evidence that he has a genuine poetic gift, and we expect to hear more of him.

Mr. Laurence Binyon's style is more academic. His contributions, 'Youth,' 'Testamentum Amoris,' 'Psyche,' 'O summer sun,' are decidedly above the average of those who write fine verse without exactly being poets, yet they lack a something convincing, they do not make his readers sure that he is a poet. We are, however, far from sure that he is not. His laboured manner may be, not, as it would with a writer of longer standing, the mark of an acquired ability, but rather that acquired formality which is often a consequence in any art, intellectual or physical, of its first necessary practice by rule, and which afterwards becomes a fuller freedom. His Shakespearean sonnet, 'Testamentum Amoris,' is much the best, and is the most natural, of his contributions. Two good quaint lines in it are these, to the lady-love:—

Yet, since 'tis you that rule me, I but find
A finer freedom in such tyranny.

Mr. Manmohan Ghose has in his favour the interest attached to his verse from its being written by one not born to the English tongue. We should not, however, be disposed to accept that fact as an excuse for shortcomings; on the contrary, we should say that if an Indian gentleman chose to publish English verse written without full idiomatic and scholarly mastery over the language, the difficulty of his attempt must be accounted a condemnation rather than an excuse. What is published as English poetry must be judged as English poetry. But that is no hard law for Mr. Manmohan Ghose. He can lay no claim to ignorance of English. As a writer he simply is English. Judged by this standard, his powers of expressive diction are above the average, and his skill in versification noticeable. And he has beyond these qualities something of that nameless but unmistakable gift of nature which makes the difference between the poet and other, perhaps abler, authors in verse. We do not think much of his first contribution, beginning:—

'Tis my twentieth year: dim, now, youth stretches behind me;
Breaking fresh at my feet, lies, like an ocean, the world.

It is stiff, and reads like a deliberate exercise in metrical composition—no poet's touch in it. We think only a little better of his lyrical dialogue 'Raymond and Ida.' But 'A Lament' (two short verses) is a true poem, "Thou who hast follow'd far with eyes of love," though unequal, has distinctly poetic passages, and "Mentem mortalia tangunt"—with some echoes of Shelley's

N°
"V tifu like
Na

An

The wan
M with mor
and We
of soci tenc
the piec
'Un Con unc
nin
Per play to like so Sha poet trac sira
Mr.

Hist
F
M
T

Pro of a lish whi in t spee is ce
cont that of A poin field shap
Frac that mar alth
Gree
Dr.
and clea mak
Nat
Mr.
first toric of t and tion rese

"We look before and after" in it—is beautiful almost throughout. We particularly like this verse—"she," be it premised, is Nature :—

O, not in vain she gave
To the wild birds their wings!
They spread them forth, and have
Heaven for their wanderings.
But we, to whom no wings are given,
Why seek we for a Heaven?

And this :—

Ah me, for all earth rears
The appointed bound is placed!
After a thousand years
The great oak falls at last:
And thou, more lovely, canst not stay,
Sweet rose, beyond thy day.

There is here spring promise enough to warrant good hope of fruit.

Mr. Arthur S. Cripps contents himself with but three contributions. He writes in more tripping measures than his colleagues, and treats his themes somewhat more lightly. We have a notion that the natural outcome of his poetic bent will be found in vers de société of the kind admitting touches of tenderness or sadness to give shade among the brightness. Of Mr. Cripps's three pieces, "Amavimus, amamus, amabimus," "Undines of Diverse Days," and "The Seasons' Comfort," we like the first best; but we feel uncomfortable about the burden line beginning each of its three verses—"Persephone, Persephone!" We can hardly call it a plagiarism—certainly anybody has a right to say "Persephone, Persephone!" if he likes; but still, as Miss Ingelow has said it so often as a burden line in her 'Light and Shade,' one is inevitably reminded of her poem, and such reminiscences always distract the reader's attention, and are undesirable for the writer, whoever he may be. Mr. Cripps writes with facility and taste.

History of England, for the Use of the Middle Forms of Schools.—Part III. William and Mary to the Present Time. By T. F. Tout, M.A. (Rivingtons.)

PROF. TOUT'S little volume is the third part of a history the first part of which was published by Mr. York Powell in 1885, and of which the second, by Mr. J. M. Mackay, is in the press. It is, therefore, premature to speak of the undertaking as a whole, but it is certainly possible to extend to Prof. Tout's contribution the warm welcome accorded to that of Mr. York Powell in the Athenæum of August 15th, 1885 (No. 3016). We there pointed out that Mr. Powell had taken the field against formidable opponents in the shape of the late J. R. Green and Dr. Franck Bright, but we expressed an opinion that he had held his own. The same remark may be applied to Mr. Tout, who, although he enters into competition with Green at his slightest and weakest, has in Dr. Bright a rival somewhat dull, it may be, and uninspiring, but remarkably sound and clear. Any one who has had occasion to make frequent use of the 'Dictionary of National Biography' will have recognized Mr. Tout as one of the first, perhaps the first, of the school of young Oxford historians which has risen under the influence of the Bishop of Oxford, Prof. Freeman, and Dr. Gardiner. But though his reputation for scholarship and thoroughness of research has already been fully established, the narrative power and political insight displayed in this little book are something of a revelation.

The exact requirements of the middle forms of schools can hardly be appreciated by one who has ceased, alas! to be a boy in a middle form, and who is not actively engaged in teaching. However, there are no primæ facie objections to be raised to Mr. Tout's understanding of their wants. He devotes considerable, but not undue space to campaigns and battles; and his accounts of Blenheim and Trafalgar, for instance, are very good reading. He deals largely in descriptions of character and personal appearance, taken for the most part from contemporary sources, and these are usually well chosen. But it is difficult to avoid thinking that more information is conveyed by reproducing a characteristic epigram or two, especially in the case of a wit like Lord North, than by a portrait, even when it is sketched in the bold outline of Horace Walpole's pastiche of the Prime Minister: "He was a coarse and clumsy-looking man, short-sighted, with a wide mouth, thick lips, and inflated visage, giving him the air of a blind trumpeter." Mr. Tout has given many historical sayings, but he might, perhaps, have given more—Mr. Stanley's "Johnny has upset the coach," for example; and one phrase that he does give is not quite correct. Walpole did not say "every man has his price," but "all these men [the Opposition] have their price." Mr. Tout's own appreciations of character, however, are admirable; for instance, this of Pitt :—

"Pitt was now just twenty-five years old. He was tall, thin, stiff in manner, dignified, sickly in health, shy and proud, though among his few intimates he was gay, easy-tempered, witty and affectionate. He had been taught oratory by his father, and had studied hard at Cambridge. Without Chatham's fire and passion, he yet had a 'premature and unnatural dexterity in the combination of words,' was a ready debater, and a fluent and impressive rhetorician. With but little of his father's genius, he had the tact and business knowledge which Chatham had lacked. Burke called him the 'sublime of mediocrity,' and the phrase expresses a truth, though not the whole truth. As a statesman, he was hopeful, stimulating and steadfast. Though so closely bound up with the king, he was too powerful and too hard-working to become his dependent like North. He still looked to the people for support, and though he led the Tory party, still called himself a Whig among his friends. He believed in parliamentary reform and relief of the Catholics, and he was in favour of a generous attitude to Ireland. He found, however, that the king and his party were against him, and he was rather too ready to rest contented with making his views known, without taking vigorous steps to carry them into effect. Under him bribery ceased, though he was a lavish creator of peers, and thought that all very rich men ought to sit in the House of Lords. He was a great financier."

Constitutional questions are discussed by Mr. Tout with discrimination, particularly in the introductions to the various books into which his volume is divided. Here and there an important topic appears to be rather curtly dismissed—for instance, the Regency Bill of 1788; but on the whole he has contrived to get into his pages a surprising amount of information on the progress of our institutions. The chapters on social advance are particularly good, and if a small space is assigned to literature and art, what little is said is, at any rate, calculated to be an addition to the knowledge of his readers. Even under the heading of amusements a boy will learn that outriggers were perfected by Henry Clasper about 1844, and that athletic sports came into vogue about 1860. In dealing with the politics of recent times Mr. Tout has not been afraid to speak out, and passes free comments on such fiercely debated questions as the Soudan expeditions. Boys—and girls, too, for that matter—are bigoted politicians, but they will probably understand the impossibility of drawing the line between matters of opinion and matters of fact, particularly where the events of yesterday are concerned. Mr. Tout's concluding book on "India and the Colonies" is an animated and sympathetic sketch of what in less skilled hands is apt to become a mere confused catalogue of battles and legislative enactments.

Much care has evidently been bestowed on maps and genealogical tables, but, as was the case with Mr. Powell's book, the index might be fuller with advantage. Before the publication of the second edition which the volume will doubtless attain, it might be well to correct the small mistake of spelling Mr. Windham's name with a y, and to amplify, if possible, one or two statements. Thus Wedderburn's "gross insult" to Franklin is mentioned, but not a word is said about Franklin's publication of the Hutchinson letters, though that publication palliates, if it does not altogether excuse, the homo trium literarum speech. Again, it is not altogether correct to say that Lord Palmerston's treatment of the Don Pacifico affair "caused general disgust" without mentioning that the "Civis Romanus sum" oration gave a new spell of life to the ministry. But these are unimportant blemishes, and on the whole Mr. Tout has thoroughly succeeded in realizing the object of his undertaking, the writing of "a practical class-book, which should be readable as well as useful for reference and study, and which should suit the teacher as well as the pupil."

NOVELS OF THE WEEK.

- Her Three Lovers.* By Alice M. Diehl. 2 vols. (Bentley & Son.)
Love's Loyalty. By Cecil Clarke. 2 vols. (Griffith & Farran.)
Thyme and Rue. By Margaret B. Cross. 2 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)
Saint Monica. By Mrs. Bennett-Edwards. (Bristol, Arrowsmith.)
Silken Threads: a Detective Story. By the Author of 'Mr. and Mrs. Morton.' (A. Gardner.)
The Paradise in Hyde Park. By Marrión Wilcox. (Gilbert & Rivington.)
A Phonographic Mystery. By L. Madrey-hijo. (Remington & Co.)
L'Éducation d'un Prince. Par Gyp. (Paris, Calmann Lévy.)

THE first volume of 'Her Three Lovers' is decidedly better than the second and last. The general "hang" of the whole is scarcely all it might be, which is disappointing, as there is some promise at first. The opening scenes are good, the presentation of the characters happy; a rather brilliant comedy might be opening out with some suitable situations and the right sort of background. But it is not to be. There is a gradual falling off and a growing sense of incapacity. The mystery is not quite justified; there seems no adequate reason for the father relinquishing his son. The constant vacillation of the hero as to the two rather nice girls who are both far too much taken up with him is inexcusable and tedious, though the author appears in sympathy with him throughout. Both are finally provided, or rather provide themselves, with husbands. The third lover is a dog, and seems dragged in and inappropriate to the surroundings.

It would be difficult to match any other two-volume novel against 'Love's Loyalty' for genuine capacity to bore and to wear out a reader's patience. Of the story itself little need be said, except that it flies about from place to place and from group to group in an inconsequent enough fashion, and that it is equally dull whether Hampstead, Paris, or Dresden be the scene, or whether young or old, rich or poor, saint or sinner, be the topic of the moment. Most of the people are too good to live, yet with few exceptions they are carried on to the end. So, too, are the villain or two of a mild type, who have each their turn and a chapter all to themselves now and again. Which is the least interesting type it would be hard to say.

'Thyme and Rue' is a pretty and an entertaining story, told with sufficient cleverness on the basis of a fairly novel plot. A man whom his friend describes as having been "the brilliant prizeman and the most distinguished scholar of his year," audacious, eloquent, a gourmet, but a dealer in freaks and fads, suddenly flees from civilization with his motherless daughter Juliet, and sets up the ideal of the Simple Life, to which he intends as far as possible to convert the world. A neighbouring widow with one son adds herself to the communion; and what more natural than that the young people should be destined for one another by their ambitious parents? The girl is an heiress, though she does not know it; and a sensible lawyer, discovering much later than he ought to have done the eccentric arrangements of the philosopher's household, contrives to get her away, and place her with some good people who teach her the ways of the world. The story of her adventures will afford the sympathetic reader a great deal of pleasure and amusement; and perhaps it may be interesting to know beforehand that the young man who was left behind in the community of the Simple Life also comes to know the ways of the world, and that after a decent interval he meets Juliet again. The story is complex, and holds more than a single romance; for "thyme and rue grow both in one garden."

As a novel 'Saint Monica' probably aims at a good deal; but it is second rate rather than not. What strength it has seems to lie in a somewhat acrid attitude towards the "hollow shams of society." The public must be already sated with the moods and views of the cynical observer of society's humours—more especially when the protest is neither sufficiently strong nor sufficiently original to give it much significance or value. It is unfair, however, to speak of 'Saint Monica' as a protest, for all that is by the way, as it were. "The passion of love" is the great feature of the story. Four young people at least—one may say all the young people, for it treats of a quartet altogether—are very much in love, and there is some rather "warm work" now and again. They change their sentiments, it is true, but the change is strictly confined to themselves. This being so, there is a certain monotony combined with violence, and Monica and her companions pall somewhat on the reader. The character of Veronica is the best sustained; the rest convey little or no impression, except that they are overstrained and exaggerated, and that one is thankful to reach the goal of their loves and despairs, their hopes and fears.

'Silken Threads' is an American sensation story, reprinted or adopted for readers on this side of the Atlantic. We have many detective stories of home production, and a fresh introduction in the overstocked market should possess extraordinary merit in order to justify its appearance, or at any rate to command special attention. It can hardly be said that a claim of this kind is established by 'Silken Threads,' which has to do with a murder, two or three false scents, a trial, and other more or less hackneyed incidents, told with average cleverness.

Marrion Wilcox unfolds, in the course of fourteen slight and not particularly coherent chapters, a grand design for a "Paradise in Hyde Park," which is to cover a mile of ground, and to afford a racecourse in mid air. Most of the chapters aforesaid are taken up with a rather pretty romance at San Remo, set in pleasant Italian scenery; but the author's object, if he may be said to have an object, is to chatter lightly and gaily rather than to tell a story about any one or anything in particular. His book has not the substance of a novel, but, considering its slightness, it is passably attractive and readable.

The vision of a scientific instrument familiarly at work in a volume of fiction is not seen for the first time in 'A Phonographic Mystery.' The phonograph itself is not, however, on this occasion the mystery; the amiable, but impossible being in the shape of a boy undoubtedly is. He is brought up in Scotland and by Scotch relatives, but the language of the United Kingdom is a sealed book to him; not because he is deaf or dumb, but because—on the theory of atavism—the author makes him "throw back" three hundred and odd years to a foreign ancestor, whose language he talks. This language is by his sorrowing relatives supposed to be mere gibberish till by means of the phonograph and other tests the sounds are registered and found to be the correct language of no less a people than the Incas. It must be allowed that Mr. Madreyhijo has saddled the theory of atavism with a very strange case indeed. Still it is a bold and amusing enough venture. For the rest the story seems to be written anyhow, and the events are sufficiently crude and inconsequent. Yet there is something pleasant about it, and a freshness of touch that greater experience could not have given.

Gyp's new volume of short stories is not one of her best. There are two which are political, and when Gyp is political she is dull. Some of the others are readable, but are not very fresh or new.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

WE have received the Gambetta volume of the "Statesmen Series" edited by Mr. Lloyd Sanders, and published by Messrs. Allen & Co. It is from the pen of Mr. Frank Marzials. The picture drawn of the French Republican statesman is a fair one; and although the book does not, perhaps, make quite enough of the man, on the whole the execution is excellent, and there is little fault to find with it. We should be inclined to take exception to the statement that as an orator Gambetta was in any sense inferior to Lord Beaconsfield, and we are even inclined to doubt whether it is fair to say that his speeches do not present "Bright's touches of pathos." The close of Gambetta's first and best-known speech is there to contradict Mr. Marzials:—

"Il y a déjà d'ailleurs quelque chose qui juge nos adversaires. Écoutez, voilà dix-sept ans que vous êtes les maîtres absolus, discrétionnaires de la France, —c'est votre mot;— nous ne recherchons pas l'emploi que vous avez fait de ses trésors, de son sang, de son honneur et de sa gloire;.....ce qui vous juge le mieux, parce que c'est l'attestation de vos propres remords, c'est que vous n'avez jamais osé dire : Nous célébrerons, nous mettrons au rang des solennités de la France le 2 Décembre comme un anniversaire national ! Et cependant tous les régimes qui se sont succédé dans ce pays se sont honorés du jour qui les a vus naître. Ils ont fêté le 14 Juillet, le 10 Août; les journées de Juillet, 1830, ont été fêtes aussi, de même que le 24 Février; il n'y a que deux anniversaires, le 18 Brumaire et le 2 Décembre, qui n'ont jamais été mis au rang des solennités d'origine, parce que vous savez que si vous vouliez les y mettre, la conscience universelle les repousserait. Eh bien ! cet anniversaire dont vous n'avez pas voulu, nous le revendiquons, nous le prenons pour nous; nous le fêterons toujours, incessamment; chaque année, ce sera l'anniversaire de nos morts."

Notes from the 'News' (Chatto & Windus) is a selection from the vivacious paragraphs Mr. James Payn contributes to the Illustrated London News, and forms an amusing miscellany of some 180 pages. The name of Russel of the Scotsman is misspelt on p. 162.

DETERMINED not to be outdone by a pirate, Mr. Heinemann has brought out in handsome shape Mr. Whistler's Gentle Art of Making Enemies, a collection of extracts from newspapers referring to the various controversies in which this whimsical artist has been engaged.

THE German Government have published, through Messrs. Duncker & Humblot, of Leipzig, the protocols of the International Conference on Labour lately held at Berlin, in a volume in which the whole of the proceedings, even speeches made in the English tongue, are given in French. It is printed upon beautiful paper. There is nothing of importance in the protocols which has not already appeared elsewhere.

VARIOUS reprints are on our table, among them a particularly charming reprint, in the "Temple Library," of Landor's Pericles and Aspasia (Dent & Co.), edited by Mr. G. Crump, and adorned with etchings by Mr. Railton.—The Boyhood and Youth of Goethe, a translation of Books I. to XI. of 'Wahrheit und Dichtung,' by John Oxenford, has been added by Messrs. Putnam to their pretty "Knickerbocker Nuggets."—Bacon's Essays is the latest volume of the "Stott Library."—Longfellow's translation of the Inferno and Purgatorio now forms two volumes of Messrs. Routledge's pretty "Pocket Library."—Mr. Scott has wisely taken advantage of the recent enthusiasm for Ibsen to reprint Mr. Gosse's excellent Northern Studies, the soundest work in the language on the subject of modern Scandinavian literature.—Mr. Salt has edited a reprint of the essay on Property from Godwin's 'Political Justice' (Sonnenschein).—Messrs. Smith & Elder have brought out a "Waterloo Edition" of Vanity Fair, one volume of clear type with the illustrations, at the low price of two shillings.—Mr. Torrens's excellent memoirs of Lord Melbourne are now reprinted in the "Minerva Library" of Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co.—Messrs. Macmillan issue neat reprints of Mr. Clark Russell's vigorous and striking tale Marooned; of The Head of the Family, by Mrs. Craik; The Ring of Amasis, Lord Lytton's ambitious, but unsatisfactory tale, which has been revised and recast by the author; Mr. Rudyard Kipling's famous Plain Tales from the Hills; and Mr. Mitford's capital Tales of Old Japan.

WE have on our table The Life and Writings of Alexander Vinet, by L. M. Lane (Edinburgh, T. & T. Clark).—Edward Burton, by H. Wood (Boston, U.S., Lee & Shepard).—Rambles in the Black Forest, by H. W. Wolff (Longmans).—Herodotus, Book VI., with Introduction and Notes by W. F. Masom and C. S. Fearenside (Clive & Co.).—Insignia Vite; or, Broad Principles and Practical Conclusions, by C. H. Waterhouse (Virtue & Co.).—Tables for Chemical Analysis, by A. T. Richardson (Relfe Brothers).—Engineering Estimates, Costs, and Accounts, by a General Manager (Lockwood).—Notes on the Pearl and Chank Fisheries and Marine Fauna of the Gulf of Manaar, by E. Thurston (Madras, Government Central Museum).—Shelley's Complete Press Directory, 1890 (Shelley & Co.).—In a Frozen Hand, by F. Millar (Drane).—A Royal Democrat, by Alice L. Milligan (Simpkin).—Saved by a Looking-Glass, by E. H. Wells (Digby & Long).—An Old Man's Love, and other Poems, by W. J. Abram (Drane).—The Proving of Gennad, by L. Lewis (Stock).—The Christ in London, and other Poems, by Tristram St. Martin (Authors' Co-operative Publishing Co.).—Four Great Teachers, by J. Forster (G. Allen).—The Pilgrims: an Allegory of the Soul's Progress from the Earthly to the Heavenly State, by C. Fox (Kegan Paul & Co.).—The Faith of a Realist, by J. Copner (Williams & Norgate).—Stones from the Quarry, by the Rev. R. Vaughan (Macmillan).—Mehayil el Hayil, Lessons for the Use of Jewish Children (Bell).—The Bible True from the Beginning, by E. Gough, Vol. III. (Kegan Paul & Co.).—The Latin Hymn-Writers and their Hymns, by the late S. W. Duffield, edited by Prof. R. E. Thompson, D.D. (Funk & Wagnalls).—Les Artistes Célèbres: Turner, by P. G. Hamerton (Paris, Librairie de l'Art).—Feste Fatte in Firenze per lo Scopimento della Facciata di S. Maria del Fiore, by Aurelio Gotti (Florence, Landi).—L'Éillet Blanc, by Alexandre Lambert de Sainte Croix (Paris, Lévy).—Das Psychologische Problem in der Hamlet-Tragödie, by Dr. H. Türc (Leipzig, Hoffmann).—Die Gebets-Verbrüderungen bis zum Ausgange des Karolingischen Zeitalters, by Dr. A. Ebner (Ratisbon, Pustet).—Le Bronze, by M. Héline (Hachette).—Edelweiss, Poésies, by Author of 'Horizons Prochains' (Paris, Lévy).—Mateo Falcone, Tamango, L'Enlèvement de la Redoute, by P. Mérimée, edited, with Notes, by W. E. Russell (Rivingtons).—Les Rêves, Physiologie et Pathologie, by Dr. Ph. Tissot (Paris, Alcan).—Recherches sur les Tremblements de Terre, by J. Girard (Paris, Leroux).—Cours de Littérature Française, by A. Caumont (Nutt).—and Hoffmann's Tales from History, edited by H. S. Beresford-Webb (Boston, U.S., Heath).

LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

ENGLISH.

Theology.

Acts of Martyrdom of Perpetua and Felicitas, Original Greek Text, edited by Harris and Gifford, roy. 8vo. 5/6 cl.
Barclay's (Rev. P.) Present-Day Lessons from Habakkuk, 3/4
Kingsley's (C.) The Water of Life, and other Sermons, 3/6 cl.

Law.

Clarke (P.) and Tidy's (C. M.) Medical Law for Medical Men, 12mo. 4/ leather.
Glen's (A.) Law relating to County Government, with Notes by W. E. Gordon, 8vo. 42/ cl.
Neish (C. H. L.) and Carter's (A. T.) The Factors Act, 1890, 4/

Fine Art.

Waterhouse's (Col. J.) Practical Notes on Preparation of Drawings for Photographic Reproduction, cr. 8vo. 5/ cl.

Poetry and the Drama.

Best Elizabethan Plays (The), edited by W. R. Thayer, 7/6
Horace's Odes, translated into English Verse by J. L. S. Hutton, cr. 8vo. 5/ cl.
Shakespeare's Julius Caesar, with Introduction and Notes by K. Deighton, 12mo. 2/ cl.
Song-Strays, 12mo. 3/6 parchment.

Music.

Crowest's (F. J.) Musical Groundwork, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
General Hymnary Tune-Book, 8vo. 2/ cl.
Wodehouse's (Mrs.) Index and Catalogue to Articles in Dictionary of Music and Musicians, edited by Sir G. Grove, 8vo. 7/6

History and Biography.

Clive (Lord), by Col. Sir C. Wilson, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl. (English Men of Action.)
D'Arblay's (Madame) Diary and Letters, with Notes by W. C. Ward, Vol. 1, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Dictionary of National Biography, edited by L. Stephen and S. Lee, Vol. 23, roy. 8vo. 15/ cl.
Lee's (S.) Stratford-on-Avon from the Earliest Times to the Death of Shakespeare, cheaper edition, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
Mackonchie (Alexander Heriot), a Memoir, by E. A. T., edited by E. F. Russell, cr. 8vo. 7/6 cl.

Geography and Travel.

Conway's (W. M.) Climber's Guide to the Central Pennine Alps, 18mo. 10/ cl.
Lane's (F. C.) Guide to Falmouth and Helford Harbours, 2/6
Page's (J. L. W.) An Exploration of Exmoor, cr. 8vo. 7/6 cl.
Stanley and Africa, by Author of 'The Life of General Gordon,' cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Stanley's (H. M.) In Darkest Africa, 2 vols. 8vo. 42/ cl.
Through North Wales with a Knapsack, by Four School-mistresses, 12mo. 2/6 cl.

Philology.

Soteldo's (A. M.) Spanish Grammar, cr. 8vo. 10/ cl.

Science.

Bashforth's (F.) Account of Experiments made with the Bashforth Chronograph, 18mo. 12/ cl.
Crimp's (W. S.) Sewage Disposal Works, 8vo. 25/ cl.
Cullimore's (D. H.) Book of Climates, cr. 8vo. 4/6 cl.
Stewart's (R. W.) Elementary Text-Book of Heat and Light, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.

General Literature.

Bennett's (A.) John Bull and his other Island, Part 2, 2/6 cl.
Björnson's (B.) In God's Way, a Novel, translated by E. Carmichael, cr. 8vo. 2/6 swd.
Burnand's (F. C.) Very Much Abroad, cr. 8vo. 5/ cl.
Coleridge (C. R.) and Bramston's (M.) Truth with Honour, a Story, cr. 8vo. 5/ cl.
Craik's (Mrs.) Two Marriages, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Dalton's (C.) The Waterloo Roll Call, cr. 8vo. 2/6 swd.
Danielli's (C. J.) The Industrial Competition of Asia, 8vo. 12/6
Downe's (H.) Innocent Victims, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
Firth's (J. C.) Nation Making, a Story of New Zealand, 6/ cl.
Gilchrist's (R. M.) Passion the Plaything, a Novel, 6/ cl.
Harper's (A.) Phil, a Story of School Life, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Inagaki's (Manjiro) Japan and the Pacific, and a Japanese View of the Eastern Question, cr. 8vo. 7/6 cl.
Miss Kennedy and her Brother, by Frib, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Phillips (F. C.) and Will's (C. J.) The Scudamores, a Novel, 2 vols. cr. 8vo. 21/ cl.
Selby's (A.) In the Sunlight, 2 vols. cr. 8vo. 12/ cl.
Sir Charles Danvers, by the Author of 'The Danvers Jewels,' cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
Stracey's (E.) Hidden in the Light, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Tempest's (N.) Forrester, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Three Notable Stories, by Marquis of Lorne, Mrs. Alexander, and Thos. Hardy, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Whistler's (J. McN.) Gentle Art of Making Enemies, 10/6
Wood's (Mrs.) Orville College, cheaper edition, cr. 8vo. 3/6

FOREIGN.

Theology.

Hand-Kommentar zum Neuen Testament, bearb. v. H. J. Holtzmann, 3m.
Harnack (A.): Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte, Vol. 3, 17m.
Henle (F. A.): Der Epheserbrief d. hl. Apostels Paulus, 5m.
Hummel (F.): Die Schrift v. Carl Schwarz üb. das Wesen der Religion, 3m.
Theologischer Jahresbericht, hrsg. v. R. A. Lipsius, Vol. 9, Part 1, 4m.

Fine Art.

Geschichte der Deutschen Kunst, Parts 30-34, 10m.
Kobell (L. v.): Miniaturen u. Initialen aus Handschriften d. 14-16 Jahrh., Parts 2 and 3, 16m.

Poetry.

Bulle (O.): Dante's Beatrice im Leben u. in der Dichtung, 2m. 50.
Goethe-Jahrbuch, hrsg. v. L. Geiger, Vol. 11, 10m.

History and Biography.

Buettner-Wobst (T.): Studia Byzantina, Part 1, 1m. 20.
Fröhlich (F.): Das Kriegswesen Cäsars, Parts 2 and 3, 1m. 40.
Mémoires du Baron Haussmann, Vol. 3, 7fr. 50.
Perey (L.): Un Petit-Neveu de Mazarin, 7fr. 50.

Geography and Travel.

Günther (S.): Handbuch der Mathematischen Geographie, 16m.
Joanne (P.): Italie du Nord, 12fr.

Philology.

Körting (G.): Lateinisch-Romanisches Wörterbuch, Parts 2 and 3, 4m.
Sophocles Tragediae, ed. J. Holub, Part 5, 0m. 80.

Science.

Hornberger (R.): Graphische Darstellungen f. den Meteorologischen Unterricht, Part 3, 24m.

General Literature.

Claretie (J.): La Cigarette, 3fr. 50.
Compagnons (Les) de La Plume, 3fr. 50.
Enault (L.): Le Sacrifice, 3fr. 50.
Hennebert (Lieut.-Col.): La Guerre Imminente, 3fr. 50.
Maizeroy (R.): Papa La Vertu, 3fr. 50.

THE SPRINGS OF FONTANA.

THE springs of Fontana well high on the mountain,
Out of the rock of the granite they pour
Twenty or more;
Ripple and runnel and freshet and fountain
Well, happy tears, from the heart of the mountain
Up at Fontana.

See, not a step can we take but a spring
Breaks from the roots of the blond-flower'd chestnuts—
(Look, in the water their long golden breast-knots Flung in caress!)—from a tuft of the ling,
From a stone, anything,
Up at Fontana.

Twenty or more, and no one of the twenty
Gushes the same; here the waters abundant
Babble redundant,
Filling the vale with the bruit of their plenty;
Here a mere ripple, a trickle, a scanty
Dew on Fontana.

Surely one noonday the Prophet in heaven
Slept, and the wand of the desert fell—
Fell to the rock, and the rock was riven.
Lo, all around it eternally well
(A miracle!)
The springs of Fontana.

Waters of boon!
In drought or in deluge unaltered, your current Flows from the rock and is icy in June,
Flows when the icicle hangs on the torrent,
Flows when the river is dry and the noon
Parches Fontana.

Over the rocks!
Over the tree-root that tangles and blocks—
Robbing from all that resists you a sunny
Scent of the cistus and rock-hidden honey,
Yarrow, campanula, thyme, agrimony—
Flow from Fontana!

Flow, happy waters, and gather and rally,
Rush to the plain.
Flow to the heavenly fields of Limain,
Blue as a dream in the folds of the valley;
Feed them and fatten with blossom and grain,
Springs of Fontana!

River of springs,
Born many times in renewal unending,
Bright, irresistible, purest of things,
Blessing the rocks that oppose you, befriending
Pastures and cattle and men in your wending Forth from Fontana.

Born (who knows how?) a mysterious fountain
Out of the stone and the dust of the mountain,
Bound to a country we know little of,
How shall I bless ye and praise ye enough,
Image of Love,
Springs of Fontana!

A. MARY F. ROBINSON
(Madame James Darmesteter).

AMERICAN COPYRIGHT.

IN a letter to the Athenæum, published June 14th, Mr. Moncreu D. Conway takes the ground that the recent adverse vote in the House of Representatives means the final defeat of the pending measure of international copyright, and that this defeat was due to the radical defects of the measure, and is, on the whole, not to be regretted. He further contends that the only plan of international copyright which has any chance of securing the approval of the American public is the scheme of authorizing any publisher, or any number of publishers, to issue American editions of foreign works, if they will agree to pay to the authors a royalty on their sales.

I have taken some part in the operations, during the past five years, of the International Copyright League, and have knowledge of the nature of the work that has been done in influencing the opinion as well of the legislators as of their constituencies, and I venture to disagree with Mr. Conway in each one of his several conclusions.

The pending Bill was formulated by the American Copyright League, a body which includes in its membership practically all the authors of the country (Mr. Conway being the only noteworthy exception whose name now occurs to me). The President of the League is Mr. Lowell, and the Vice-President Mr. Stedman, and among the more active of the members of its executive committee are Dr. Eggleston, and Mr. Gilder and Mr. Johnson (of the Century). The League's membership comprises, in addition to the authors, a large representation of the general public, principally from among the communities where bookreading and bookbuying are most active.

In beginning its campaign, five years back, the executive committee of the Authors' League called into its counsels a similarly representative committee of the Publishers' League, which had been organized for the purpose of giving the co-operation required; and every step taken in the formulating of the Copyright Bill, in modifying the first drafts of this, and in pressing the reform before Congress and the people, was decided upon by the joint committee of authors and publishers working in conference, while with hardly an exception such decisions were arrived at by a unanimous vote.

The Bill which finally resulted from the work of this committee and from the counsels of the friends of copyright in Congress was not an ideal measure, nor were all of its provisions in accord with the individual wishes of either the authors or the publishers. They recognized, however, that the essential thing was to secure a recognition of the right of aliens to possess literary property, and that the conditions or restrictions upon which such right was made to depend were matters of minor importance, the final adjustment of which could safely be left to the future. The nation had decided upon a protective policy, and in pressing the Copyright Bill through the two Houses along the lines of least resistance, it became evident that any copyright measure which was to have any chance of success must be brought into accord with the protective system.

The contest for international copyright has been going on for more than half a century, having begun in 1837. The pending Bill is the first one which has ever been brought to a vote in the House of Representatives, and it has secured, as well in Congress as throughout the country, a far larger share of support than has been accorded to any previous measure, or than would at this time be given to any essentially different measure.

The defeat of the Bill was by no means due to its restrictive clauses, but to the regrettable fact that the majority of the Representatives are not yet prepared to concede to aliens the control of their literary productions. What has, I think, not yet been referred to in the English comments on the matter is the fact that the adverse vote came almost entirely from the representatives of the less intelligent constituencies, the "backwoods" communities, where very few books are read, either English or American, and where a fair understanding of the claims of literary producers could, perhaps, hardly be looked for. The representatives of the great bookbuying communities of the middle states, New England, and the North-West, the communities which have made the largest use of English literature, and which have the most intelligent interest in the development of American literature—these representatives, with hardly an exception, voted for the Bill. It was defeated by the votes of the "Solid South," the South-West, and the far West—by states like Texas, Arkansas, Missouri, Mississippi, Nevada, &c.; and the support given to it by one or two of the ablest of the Southern leaders, such as Carlisle and Breckenridge of Kentucky, and Wilson of West Virginia, was not able to influence in the right direction the mass of this "backwoods" vote. It was a "statesman" from Texas who made the discovery that "if international copyright had existed in the days of Newton, the impetuous American student would have been prevented from profiting by the 'Principia.'" The "missionary" work done in Washington by the representatives of the League had in the main been devoted to the Congress-men from the North-West, partly because we had with them some common ground on which to talk, and partly because we were under the impression that the Southern and South-Western vote would, if not favourable, be at least indifferent. The support of the New England and middle states members was in any case assured.

The adverse vote was in the end influenced not only by ignorance of the nature of the issue, but also by a confusion or misapprehension of terms, which was cleverly taken advantage of by the (comparatively small) group of active opponents of the reform. The week preceding the vote on the Copyright Bill had witnessed a bitter debate on the "monopolies" and "trusts" which are based upon the tariff. When the copyright matter was brought up, the assertion was promptly made that this was simply a continuation of the previous discussion, and that the pending Act was an attempt to foist upon the public a fresh "monopoly" of the most obnoxious character, a "monopoly of ideas." The supporters of the Bill, of course, took pains to repeat the obvious truisms that copyright, whether domestic or international, created no monopoly in ideas, but merely gave a rightful control over some special form in which the ideas had been presented, and that the ideas formulated by an author and the facts collected by him were as available for use after he had written as before. They pointed out further that the "protection" asked for by authors was not the "protection" conceded to the copper miners or the steel manufacturers—a protection which meant the right to tax or to hamper somebody else—but was simply the police protection which modern civilization accords to all other producers of property; and that the two classes of "protection" ought no more to be confounded with each other than the spring of the year with the spring of a watch. These arguments proved, however, unavailing, and the baneful terms "monopoly" and "protection," misapplied as they were, confused a sufficient number of the "backwoods" members to decide the vote. This first vote, however, by no means decides the question, as Mr. Conway assumes to be the case. The Copyright League propose to continue the fight from Congress to Congress until the rights of authors have been secured and literary property has been given the same safeguard of the law as is given to other property. The more intelligent portions of our country (a country whose sixty millions of peoples comprise not one community, but many) have already been converted, and while the conversion of states like Texas and Arkansas is certainly a more difficult task, this also will be accomplished, and in the near future.

Mr. Conway's scheme for "open publishing" is, of course, not new, having been more than once discussed and dismissed as unavailable and impracticable whether for domestic or for international requirements. It was submitted for the consideration of the British Copyright Commission of 1879, which gave, if I remember rightly, one vote in its favour. It was talked over very thoroughly by the American authors at the time the present Bill was being framed, and the Association dismissed it as impracticable, and as inequitable even if practicable. The Association of British Authors has refused to give the smallest measure of approval to the scheme, and writers like Huxley, Tyndall, and others took pains to point out that such a method could not properly be called a copyright system at all. There is no argument in behalf of "open publishing" for Transatlantic editions which would not apply with equal force to the adoption of a similar system for the home-country editions. If an author's property-rights in his productions are to be recognized at all, he must be permitted, as are other producers, to select his own business agents, and, what is still more important, he must be placed in a position to supervise the printing of all of his editions, and to assure himself that the word that he has written is the word that reaches his reader. Under the plan advocated by Mr. Conway, a dozen or more publishers throughout the States would be enabled to issue what they could call "authorized" editions of an English work. The majority of these editions would be more or less inaccurate or incomplete, and their illustrations and general style would be such as the author could not approve. The English author would have a claim for royalties against a number of more or less responsible dealers scattered over a great country, while the margin of profits, out of which all compensation to authors must in the end be paid, would be reduced, as at present, by the scramble, cut-throat competition. Such a system would be a travesty on copyright, and might more properly be termed "copy-wrong." It would also be a very serious barrier in the way of the large class of literary undertakings (of great importance for the reading community) which come into existence at the instance of the publishers, and which often represent years of editorial and publishing planning and outlay. If the profitable portions of such undertakings are to be appropriated at will by those who have had no part in the planning or in the original outlay, there can be little encouragement for their continued production.

There would be no possible chance of such a scheme of international copyright securing the favourable attention of Congress in the face of the opposition and criticism of the great body of authors, and of all those having knowledge of the requirements and the history of the production of books.

Mr. Conway makes special objection to the provision in the pending Bill requiring simultaneous publication of the European and American editions of a European work securing American copyright. Such a restriction is, of course, open to criticism as occasionally placing difficulties in the way of an author securing Transatlantic copyright for his first book. But such difficulties have been very much lessened since type-writing processes have enabled an author to prepare duplicate copies of his MS. for simultaneous consideration in publishing offices on each side of the Atlantic; and the objection becomes of still less weight when we remember that English publishers have branches in New York, and American houses branches in London, through which Transatlantic arrangements for promising books can be made without delay. Even if copyright in a first book should occasionally be lost, there would surely be a substantial gain in securing protection for all the subsequent volumes.

For the considerations before mentioned, and for many others which I have not space here to specify, I feel assured that the "open publishing" or "royalty" plan advocated by Mr. Conway would fail to do justice to the rightful requirements either of the authors or of the reading public, and cannot secure as a basis for international copyright (any more than it could for domestic copyright) the support of public opinion or of legislative votes. I am also confident that, notwithstanding the opposition and inertia of the "backwoods" communities of the States, and notwithstanding also the misleading efforts of one or two thinking men like Mr. Conway, upon whose co-operation we ought to have been able to depend, those who are working to bring about international copyright will not abandon their labours until the American Republic has been brought to a full recognition of the rightful claims of authors, American and foreign, and of the right of property in literature.

GEO. HAVEN PUTNAM,

Secy. Amer. Publishers' Copyright League.

THE SUMMER PUBLISHING SEASON.

MESSRS. MASTERS & Co. announce 'The Missionary's Foundation of Doctrine,' by the Bishop of Nassau,—'Mother's Evening Talks,' by Mrs. Maclear, edited, with preface, by Archdeacon

Scott, of Dublin,—‘The Builders of the Church in Northumbria,’ by M. H. Hall, dedicated by permission to the Bishop of Wakefield,—‘The Divine Constitution of the Church on Earth,’ by Canon West, of Lincoln,—‘The Way Out: a Northumbrian Pitman’s Story,’ by Austin Clare,—and ‘Memento, a Perpetual Calendar; or, Hints to Awaken Memory,’ suggested by A. L. I. G., compiler of ‘Quaint Charms.’

‘BLUNDERS AND FORGERIES.’

Woolbeding, Midhurst, June 10, 1890.

THE writer of the review which appeared in the Athenæum, May 31st, of ‘Blunders and Forgeries: Historical Essays,’ by the Rev. T. E. Bridgett, of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, has made an erroneous statement which I shall be much obliged if you will allow me to correct. Referring to the two volumes of letters of the reign of Henry III. edited for the Rolls series by the late Dr. Shirley, he says: “In one of them a priest is complained of for having two wives and claiming the bishop’s dispensation.” (It was not the bishop’s dispensation which he claimed, but the Pope’s. I only mention this, however, by the way.) Your reviewer proceeds: “Mr. Stephens, when writing his little ‘History of the Diocese of Chichester’ for the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, made capital out of the excellent story, and his reviewers picked it out as one of the plums. So it would be, and a very precious plum too, but that Mr. Bridgett shows, plainly enough, that the two wives were two benefices to which the uxorious pluralist was married.” It is clear that your reviewer has not read my “little history,” for it contains no allusion to the story in question. In a much larger work, ‘Memorials of the See of Chichester,’ published many years before, I translated extracts (pp. 79–82) from the letters of Simon de Seintiz, the steward of the Bishop of Chichester, including the passage in question. But I made no “capital of the story.” I simply translated the words “duas habet uxores” in the only way in which they could be translated, whether they refer to wives or benefices, and made no comment upon them whatever. I received some time afterwards an anonymous pamphlet written to prove that the word “uxores” in this letter must mean “benefices,” not “wives.” I held, and still hold, that the writer made out his case, but I may mention that some scholars of the highest eminence to whom I showed the pamphlet were not of the same opinion. Accordingly, in my ‘History of the Diocese,’ published in 1881, I omitted all reference to the disputed passage.

W. R. W. STEPHENS.

* * Mr. Stephens is entitled to an apology. The blunder which he made in his ‘Memorials,’ published in 1876, he did not repeat in his ‘History.’ In the later volume we find there is no reference to the two wives.

SALES.

THE sale of the extensive library of Sir E. Sullivan, Bart., Lord Chancellor of Ireland, at the rooms of Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge, concluded at last on the 13th inst. On the twentieth day the lots more eagerly contested were: Julian Notary’s edition of Voltaire’s Golden Legend, slightly imperfect, 41l. Voltaire’s Maid of Orleans, the translation attributed to Lady Charleville, 9l. 12s. Walton’s Autograph in Hales’s Remains, 5l. 15s. The twenty-first day comprised autograph letters, engravings, &c. Amongst others Southey’s Correspondence sold for 17l. Lord Nelson’s letter to Admiral Collingwood, 5l. 5s. Lamb’s letter to Miss Betham, 8l. Burns’s autograph of ‘Scots wha hae wi’ Wallace bled,’ 70l. Lord Byron’s letter to Col. Stanhope, 6l. 6s. The entire sale produced 11,002l. 6s.

The manuscripts of Wilkie Collins’s novels, which we mentioned some time ago, were brought to the hammer at the rooms of Messrs. Sotheby on Wednesday. They fetched over 1,300l. The MS. of ‘The Woman in White’ sold for 320l.; ‘The Moonstone,’ 125l.; ‘Armada,’ 101l.; and ‘No Name,’ 85l. The manuscript of ‘The Frozen Deep,’ in Collins’s handwriting, with annotations by Dickens, the prompt-book, and the MS. of the story were put up as one lot on the same occasion, and brought 300l.; while the MS. of ‘The Perils of Certain English Prisoners’ (the Christmas number of Household Words for 1857) sold for 200l.

DAY TRAINING COLLEGES UNDER THE NEW CODE.

THE Education Department have begun their work of administering the New Code by issuing a circular respecting day students in Training Colleges. Our readers are aware that Sir James Kay-Shuttleworth, the first secretary to the Committee of Council on Education, was an enthusiastic believer in the utility of Training Colleges. Indeed, in conjunction with Mr. Carleton Tufnell, he founded a College at Battersea in the year 1839 for training a limited number of young men as schoolmasters. The institution afforded a generally liberal education, and special instruction in the best methods of imparting knowledge to children, while an elementary school near to the College exemplified these methods, and enabled the students themselves to put them into practice. Fresh from his experience at Battersea, Sir J. Kay-Shuttleworth was ardent in his endeavours to encourage the foundation of similar institutions throughout the country, and they have become the keystone of our system of elementary education.

Of these institutions at present receiving annual grants from the Department there are now forty-four, thirty being supported by the Church of England, and the remainder by the British, Roman Catholic, or Wesleyan School Committees. The original cost of their buildings was nearly 400,000l. Last year their expenditure was 170,814l. They had in residence 3,277 students, and received from the Department 117,000l. Up to now that the College should be residential has been an absolute essential of a grant from the Department, but in the New Code of this year provision is made for Queen’s scholars attending merely as day students. The present normal schools may receive day students, who will have to fulfil all the conditions, excepting those relating to residence, prescribed for the other Queen’s scholars. They will have to devote their whole time to studies and normal training, and they may not be on the staff of any school; but they may reside at their own homes, or in a house suitably kept and furnished by the local committee, or in lodgings provided by them. Where a day training school is not part of a residential normal school, it must (by article 111) be attached to some university or college of university rank. The authorities of a Day Training College must be a local committee, who will be held responsible for the discipline and moral supervision of the students, and for their regular attendance at professorial or other lectures. The circular from the Department prescribes the course of study, or rather states the obligatory and optional subjects of study, and lays down the preliminary questions which will have to be answered by the authorities of Day Training Colleges before they can be recognized by the Department. These relate (e.g.) to the constitution of the local committee, whether identical or not with the governing body of the university or other college; to the number of students it is proposed to admit, the conditions of admission, the arrangements for their lodging, instruction, and general superintendence.

Substantial aid is offered to the Day Training Colleges by article 127 of the Code. “A grant will be made annually, through the local committee, of 25l. to each male and of 20l. to each female Queen’s scholar, and a grant of 10l. to the committee in respect of each Queen’s scholar enrolled for continuous training throughout the year”; and grants of corresponding amounts will be paid to day Queen’s scholars in residential colleges.

Objection has been taken in some quarters to the maximum number of two hundred, which by article 116 has been fixed for recognition at one and the same time as day students; but it is to be remembered that this is an experiment, the regulations are tentative, and founded entirely on the recommendations of the Royal Commission. The Commissioners in the section of their report relating to Training Colleges say:—

“Considering the large need which exists for more ample or more generally available opportunities of training and the importance of giving every facility for training to those who now obtain certificates without it, an experiment should be made of training non-residential students in connexion with local university colleges, subject to the condition that only a limited number of students should receive Government assistance towards their training. Such a number of students should be aided by the Department as are found practically necessary to complete the supply of trained teachers, who should be largely substituted for the present mass of untrained and uncertificated teachers.”

It is on this recommendation that the Department have at present fixed the number at two hundred; but there is no magic or particular virtue in this number, and it can easily be increased if circumstances render it necessary. Such seems to be the opinion of Sir W. Hart-Dyke.

The experiment will be watched with interest. Probably the training offered will not be confined to Queen’s scholars merely, but other persons who intend to adopt the teaching profession in second and higher grade schools will doubtless, on moderate terms, be admitted to the benefits of the special professional training which will be offered in these institutions. This will be good for themselves and for the elementary teachers sitting by their sides. As we have said before, the teachers in our elementary schools are drawn too exclusively from one class, and we cannot see why the emoluments now earned by them should not tempt a superior class of men and women into their ranks. They are unquestionably performing most important duties, and deserve every encouragement and support.

Literary Gossip.

IN our number for July 5th we shall publish our articles on the continental literature of the past twelve months. They include Belgium by MM. É. de Laveleye and P. Fredericq, Bohemia by M. Cermák, Denmark by M. Petersen, France by M. J. Reinach, Germany by Hofrath Zimmermann, Greece by M. Lambros, Italy by Commendatore Bonghi, Norway by M. Jæger, and Russia by M. Milyoukov.

A NEW volume of essays by Prof. Huxley will shortly be published by Messrs. Macmillan. The essays themselves will be reprints of those that have already appeared in the monthly reviews, but they will be preceded by an elaborate introduction which is altogether new, and should give the book a special interest. Prof. Huxley is also writing an article on ‘Lux Mundi,’ which will appear in the next number of the Nineteenth Century.

SIR F. POLLOCK, too, is collecting into a volume the articles he has written for various English and American magazines, and will shortly publish them through Messrs. Macmillan under the title of ‘The Science of Politics.’

THE publication of Mr. Marion Crawford’s new novel ‘A Cigarette Maker’s Romance’ is deferred till the autumn. It will first make its appearance in serial form on the Continent.

PROF. VAMBÉRY is preparing for Mr. Fisher Unwin's "Adventure Series" a volume on the life of a man whose adventures are said to be even more interesting than those of the professor himself. Meanwhile the 'Journal of Robert Drury,' which is just published, will be followed in July by the 'Military Career of John Shipp,' a book which is very little known to the present generation.

It now appears likely that the question of a teaching university for London will be settled on the basis of a compromise proposed by the Senate, to the effect that (1) the two London colleges, with university assessors, shall conduct their own examinations, subject to the control of a standing committee of the Senate, for the pass degrees of B.A. and B.Sc., but the examinations for honours and for the higher degrees shall be reserved to the University; (2) the same arrangement may be made (as proposed by Convocation) with any or all of the affiliated provincial colleges; (3) ordinary degrees in medicine shall be awarded by examiners representing the Royal colleges together with the University to students who have passed the matriculation and preliminary scientific examinations either in the University or in one of the constituent colleges. The existing medical degree of the University would continue to be awarded on the present conditions, and would thus take its proper place as an "Honours" degree in medicine. The opposition, if any, will be from the medical graduates in Convocation, on the ground that the alternative examination implies a lowering of the present standard.

THE forthcoming volume of the 'Dictionary of National Biography,' to be published on the 26th inst., extends from Gray to Haighton. Mr. Leslie Stephen writes on Gray the poet and Thomas Hill Green the philosopher; the Rev. Nicholas Pocock on Bishop Gray of Cape Town; Canon Creighton on John Richard Green, on Sir George Grey, and on Archbishop Grindal; Mr. R. E. Graves on Valentine Green, the mezzotint engraver; Mr. A. H. Bullen on Robert Greene, the Elizabethan author, and William Habington; Mr. Richard Garnett on William Rathbone Greg; Mr. C. H. Firth on Sir Bevil Grenville; Prof. J. K. Laughton on Sir Richard Grenville; Mr. G. F. Russell Barker on George Grenville, Richard Temple Grenville (Earl Temple), and W. W. Grenville (Lord Grenville); Mr. Charles Welch on Sir Thomas Gresham; Mr. Sidney Lee on Sir Fulke Greville (Lord Brooke) and Guy of Warwick; Mr. J. A. Hamilton on Charles, second Lord Grey; the Rev. William Hunt on Walter de Grey, Archbishop of York; Sir Alexander J. Arbuthnot on Sir William Grey, Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal; the Rev. H. R. Luard, D.D., on Bishop Grosseteste; Prof. G. Croom Robertson on the Grotes and Edmund Gurney; Mr. James Gairdner on Sir Richard Guildford; Mr. Thompson Cooper on Thomas Gurney, shorthand writer; Mr. G. T. Bettany on Guy of Guy's Hospital and Sir William Gull; Mr. Joseph Knight on Nell Gwyn; Mr. R. E.

Anderson on John Hadley, the inventor of the sextant; and Mr. Lionel Cust on Louis Haghe, the water-colour painter.

MR. CHARLES BOOTH, the author of 'Life and Labour in East London,' is well on his way to the second volume of his survey of industrial London, which is to be completed in four volumes. The second instalment will probably be ready next March, and will be general, not local, in its scope; still it will have special reference, however, to the southern and central districts. It will be illustrated by a "poverty map of all London," carefully coloured to show the various grades of social misery described in the work on the East-End. Another special feature will be a minute and elaborate examination of social problems which the work of the Board schools has brought to light. The publishers are Messrs. Williams & Norgate.

WE regret to hear of the death of Mr. F. A. Suttaby, formerly of the old-established publishing firm of Suttaby & Co., in which he relinquished his interest several months ago, when the house was turned into a limited company, and the result not being satisfactory, the business is, we understand, now wound up.

THERE seems to be a marked decline of late years in the value of the well-known Abbotsford edition of the Waverley novels, of which a copy was sold for ten guineas in the recent dispersal of Sir Edward Sullivan's library. A few years ago booksellers readily paid from 12*l.* to 14*l.* for a copy. It is not generally known that in printing the book a number of copies were wrongly paginated, but as the sheets were correctly designated at the foot the error escaped detection both by the binder and the public.

THE Harleian Society has been lately enriched by the presentation, by the Rev. W. E. Layton, of the Registers of St. Mary-le-Tower, Ipswich, comprising baptisms, marriages, and burials, dating from 1538 to 1880, which have all been transcribed by him, and placed in the Society's hands for publication at a subsequent period.

WE regret to hear that Mr. Thomas Nelson, of the publishing house of Thomas Nelson & Sons, is seriously ill.

'THE VERDICT' is the title of the new work which Prof. Dicey has written in order to place before the public the political results of the Report of the Special Commission in a systematic and impressive manner. It will be published by Messrs. Cassell & Co.

MESSRS. SAMPSON LOW & Co. ask us to announce that, as the American edition of Mr. Stanley's book, 'In Darkest Africa,' will not be ready till the 28th, they are obliged to postpone their day of publication from the 24th, as already announced, to Saturday the 28th inst.

IN the Cornhill Magazine for July will be commenced a serial story entitled 'Eight Days: a Story of the Indian Mutiny,' by the author of 'The Touchstone of Peril.' The events are drawn from life by one who was in India at the time of the outbreak.

THE second volume of the "Welsh Texts Series," containing 'The Bruts,' or historical chronicles of Wales, under the editorship of Prof. Rhys and Mr. Gwenogvryn Evans, is now ready for distribution among subscribers. The next volume of the series will be a diplomatic reproduction of the Liber Landavensis, the register of Llandaff Cathedral, from a MS. in the possession of Mr. P. B. Davies-Cooke, of Gwysaney.

THE long-sought source of the 'Rules of Civility,' contained in a boyish manuscript of George Washington, has been discovered. Mr. M. D. Conway was led to suspect a French origin by the discovery that Washington's pastor at the time (1745) was a Huguenot named Marye. On the suggestion of Dr. Garnett, of the British Museum, Mr. Conway examined an old work in Latin and French, 'Communis Vitæ inter Homines Scita,' and has found in it nearly all of Washington's 110 rules. In 1888 Dr. Toner printed in Washington city a transcript of the 'Rules,' so far as they are now legible. An edition, with the omissions supplied within brackets, and a monograph on the whole subject, will be prepared by Mr. Conway.

It is proposed to publish in lithographed facsimile a manuscript volume of recipes which was discovered some years ago amongst the papers belonging to the firm of Gilpin & Co., chemists, Pilgrim Street, Newcastle. The manuscript is declared to date from about the time of Elizabeth. There is said to be evidence of its having been used in the family of the great Lord Fairfax.

THE death is announced of the Rev. J. Yonge, who edited Horace and a selection from Cicero's Letters.

A SECOND and more complete edition of Garibaldi's 'Epistolario' is in preparation, which will be illustrated with numerous drawings of the historical events of his life and with the portraits of many of his officers. Any one in possession of letters not already included in the first edition, or of interesting drawings or portraits, would greatly oblige by forwarding copies to Signor Ricci, Mount Park, Ealing.

THE German papers report the discovery at Cairo of a Coptic manuscript which contains much new light upon the famous Council of Ephesus in 431. The book consists of a series of letters written from Ephesus by Cyril, Patriarch of Alexandria, to his agent at the court of Theodosius II., and also a report by this agent, Victor the Younger, on the result of his negotiations.

IN the July number of the Calcutta Review there is to appear an article entitled 'Monks and Monasteries in Tibet,' giving the results of some special researches into the present condition of Buddhist religious communities, and propounding new theories as to the origin of Lamaism and monastic institutions in Central Asia. The chief value of the paper, however, consists in the summary given of the topographical and archaeological details collected by the secret native explorers of the Trans-Frontier Survey concerning the principal monasteries of Tibet, such as Tashi-Lhumpo, Galdan, Sera, &c.

MR. HENRY FROWDE will publish in the early autumn a 'Guide-Book to Books.' This guide-book will contain lists of books that may be recommended as of value in every department of knowledge, and brief notes will be added, where necessary, explanatory of the scope and nature of the works mentioned in it.

THE series of articles recently contributed to the Archæological Review by Mr. David MacRitchie, in which he supports the "realistic" interpretation of the traditions relating to dwarfs and fairies, will, with several additions, be published by Messrs. Kegan Paul & Co., under the title of 'The Testimony of Tradition,' in a few days.

THE Rev. J. C. Blomfield is continuing his 'History of the Deanery of Bicester.' The fourth section is nearly ready for publication, and will be issued by Mr. Elliot Stock.

THE Asiatic Society of Bengal has succeeded in procuring from Tibet, through the agency of a native emissary, a copy of the 'Tangyur,' a monster encyclopædia of Tibetan Buddhism, comprising 225 volumes, each volume 2 feet long by 6 inches thick. No less a sum than 3,000 rupees has been given for the work to a Buddhist monastery in Tibet, and the amount has been in great part provided by the Government of India out of the usual grant to the Oriental Translation Fund. Some years ago the Russian Government obtained a copy from Peking; but only 700 roubles was given for it. We in England possess the 225 volumes of the 'Tangyur' in the Secretary of State's Library at the India Office.

SOME important changes have recently been made in the Arts curriculum of the Bombay University. The collegiate course has been extended from three to four years, and the change, though likely to operate harshly on the poorer students, has been supported by the native members of the Senate. Each undergraduate will in future be required to pass a test examination yearly in English prose composition. The history of England and India and political economy are made compulsory subjects for the third and fourth year of the course. A proposal made by some of the native members to make the vernacular languages part of the university course was negatived.

MESSRS. GRIFFITH, FARRAN & Co. have in the press a novel in two volumes, entitled 'Paul Nugent, Materialist,' by H. F. Hetherington (Gullifer) and the Rev. H. D. Burton, and intended as a rejoinder to 'Robert Elsmere.'

THE first instalment of Dr. von Döllinger's posthumous works, the publication of which we announced some time ago, will consist of 'Erklärungen und Briefe über die Vatikanischen Decrete 1869 bis 1889'; none of which writings is said to have been published before.

A COLLECTION of the 'Kleine Schriften' of Dr. Karl Rodbertus, who was the most distinguished representative of "Conservative Socialism," and whose mode of thought resembled somewhat that of Ricardo, will be published immediately under the editorship of Herr M. Wirth. The volume will contain, besides the author's 'Minor Writings,' which, in their scattered form, have long been out of print, his famous open letter to Mazzini and the latter's reply.

PROFS. KUENEN and DILLMANN and Count Landberg have addressed a letter to Sir H.

Rawlinson, couched in moderate terms, and intended to induce the supporters of the London Congress to give way in favour of Oxford. The writers admit that infractions of legality were committed at the Christiania Congress, and they say not a word about the Oriental Institute which Count Landberg declared had been founded, but which, it may be presumed, has been abandoned. It seems that for their International Committee they have been unable to find an Orientalist willing to join them in France, England, Russia, or Spain. This shows pretty clearly what a strong feeling was excited by the attempt made at Christiania to "capture" the Congress.

IT is proposed to reprint the famous Lescar Breviary of 1541 from the unique copy in the possession of M. Couture, of Toulouse. The Abbé Dubarat, of Pau, will be the editor.

THE Parliamentary Papers of this week do not contain any that are of general interest.

SCIENCE

Organic Evolution as the Result of the Inheritance of Acquired Characters according to the Laws of Organic Growth. By Dr. G. H. Theodor Eimer. Translated by J. T. Cunningham. (Macmillan & Co.)

Studies in Evolution and Biology. By Alice Boddington. (Stock.)

MR. CUNNINGHAM has been induced to translate Prof. Eimer's work as a counterblast to the "uncritical acceptance accorded to Prof. Weismann's theories of heredity and variation by many English evolutionists." Men of science ought to welcome any contribution from a competent writer which attacks generally accepted doctrines, for it is only by free and open discussion that progress is ensured. We are not sure that we do not see signs of impatience of opposition which are much to be deplored, and we think that some explanation is due with regard to the statement of Mr. Cunningham that a letter to a scientific contemporary was suppressed by its editor. He is probably labouring under a misapprehension; but he is clearly angry at the injustice under which he thinks himself to be suffering.

To turn, however, from the translator to the author. With every wish to give a fair reception to an assailant of Dr. Weismann, the critic will find it difficult to be patient with a zoologist of Prof. Eimer's acquirements and position who starts with the assertion that it is a just objection to the Darwinian explanation of the origin of species "that it asserted the predominance of chance." But this is a point which need not detain the reader long, for Prof. Huxley some years since disposed of this accusation, so far as Mr. Darwin is concerned; while Mr. Wallace, only last year, again warned us that we "must get rid of the idea that chance determines which shall live and which die."

With the works of Darwin, indeed, Prof. Eimer seems to have only an imperfect acquaintance. It was with astonishment we read—

"We know that mere 'intelligence' alone is ascribed to animals as distinguished from man; it is not admitted that they are also possessed of 'reason,' and it is remarkable that this distinction is upheld to the present day even by zoologists";

when we remembered that Darwin wrote—

"Only a few persons now dispute that animals possess some powers of reasoning. Animals may constantly be seen to pause, deliberate, and resolve. It is a significant fact that the more the habits of any particular animal are studied by a naturalist, the more he attributes to reason and the less to unlearned instinct."

Again, Prof. Eimer says:—

"I go even further, and maintain that even what is called 'articulate' speech does not constitute a distinction between man and the lower animals";

but, years ago, Mr. Darwin said:—

"That which distinguishes man from the lower animals is not the understanding of articulate words.....it is not the mere articulation which is our distinguishing character.....nor is it the mere capacity of connecting definite sounds with definite ideas.....the lower animals differ from man solely in his almost infinitely larger power of associating together the most diversified sounds and ideas."

We have cited these two cases, not because we desire to put even Charles Darwin into the chair of authority, but as evidence that a philosopher who claims to add to Darwinian doctrines has not mastered the contents of Darwin's books. We have had to point this out before, and we by no means expect that we shall not have to do it again.

It may be no reproach to the learned author that he has not read the 'Essay on Man,' but if he will turn to line 267 of the first epistle he will find put in simpler, but not less effective language a conclusion which he urges thus:—

"The single being, as the German term for individual (einzelwesen) rightly implies, is but a fragment, not merely of its own species, but also of the totality of the animal kingdom. In the light of this conception, the latter in connexion with the rest of nature is seen as a harmonious whole consisting of many members, in which no part has any right to absolute pre-eminence over another. When we consider the animal world as such a whole, we reach the conception of our great philosopher Oken, who regarded individuals as the organs of the whole."

This, no doubt, looks very profound, but the substance of it is old enough; and, to tell the truth, the same is the case with a good deal of Dr. Eimer's ponderously written volume, the reasoning in which is so obscure and the tone so aggressive that we are led to wonder why Mr. Cunningham was so ill advised as to waste his time in translating it. Prof. Eimer has made excellent researches in various departments of zoology, but he cannot write theoretical works to suit the English taste. It may be, of course, that a long study of such plain writers as Darwin has warped our literary sense; but we are bound to confess that, as we closed the volume, we were reminded of the witty remark of one of the most learned of living bishops. Wearied with the importunities of an evolutionist, who assured him that man only differed from monkeys in his power of speech, the divine urged that the difference surely lay in the fact that a man could hold his tongue.

Mrs. Boddington remarks that she is "at a loss to imagine why it is considered almost wrong to write about physical science without having made original experiments."

It is easy to explain to her by the help of her book why it is vexatious to the expert. No one who had the knowledge of other naturalists' work which an investigator should possess would have allowed an unknown "Thoresby" to be made responsible for one of Prof. Moseley's discoveries; it can hardly be exceptionally bad proof-reading that passed such a definition of Zoëa as "an early stage in the life of decayed crustaceans," or "pysostomes" among fishes. Mrs. Boddington must surely be the only extant writer who could say that the genius of Lamarck had "found the right road, which had to be rediscovered by Darwin"; one of the two may be right, but both assuredly were not. She is certainly not at one with Darwin when she credits natural selection with having made improvements in beauty; but then she is not well acquainted with the relative value of various researches, or she would not have implied that the lamented T. R. Lewis was a dabbler with the microscope.

These are the kind of errors that make it not "almost wrong," but dangerous for unskilled persons to publish excerpts from their note-books.

How Mrs. Boddington has performed her task from the literary point of view may be judged by such passages as, "It will make the difficulties of the question to be solved appear more clearly if we go through the main orders of mammals," which is not an example of correct English; or "allowing that the mammoth died, say of regret that the glacial period was passing away," which is very poor fun. On the whole, however, Mrs. Boddington has not done her work badly. Her facts are second-hand, her style is not good, and her selection of authorities is not always judicious, yet if she has aimed at interesting those who know less about natural history than she does, she must be considered to have succeeded, and if such readers will take the book for what it is worth it will not do them any harm; if, as it may, it induce them to take a real interest in "evolution and biology," it may be the means of doing them a great deal of good.

ASTRONOMICAL NOTES.

PROF. H. C. VOGEL, Director of the Astrophysical Observatory at Potsdam, has communicated to the Berlin Academy of Science a paper in which he announces that his spectroscopic observations of Spica prove that it is in fact a close binary star, the period of revolution amounting to only 4 days 0.3 hours. The greatest observed motion in the line of sight due to orbital velocity is about sixty miles per second, and on the assumption that the plane of the orbit is not very greatly inclined to the line of sight this would lead to the conclusion that the distance of the observed star from the centre of gravity of the system is nearly three millions of miles; whilst, if the companion is at about the same distance, the combined mass of the two bodies would be about 1.2 of that of the sun. Prof. Vogel adds that the numerous observations at Potsdam of the lines in the spectrum of Rigel seem to point to a similar conclusion to that from the changes observed in those of Spica, but in this case the amount of change is small, and not sufficient to be numerically eliminated from the observations hitherto available.

Dr. Bidschop publishes in No. 2970 of the Astronomische Nachrichten a new determination, based on places derived from observations up to May 24th, of the orbit of the comet (a, 1890) discovered by Mr. Brooks on March 19th. He finds that the perihelion passage took place about midnight on the 1st inst., at the distance from the sun of 1.91 in terms of the earth's mean distance; the motion is retrograde, and the inclination of the plane of the orbit about 59° 27' to that of the earth. The comet's brightness has never much exceeded three times what it was at the date of discovery, and is slowly diminishing. Its place is now in the constellation Draco, not far from the star η , which it passed about 4° to the north on the night of the 19th inst.

Prof. Schiaparelli has published Considerazioni sul Moto Rotatorio del Pianeta Venere, in which he considers that he has brought forward evidence that Venus rotates on her axis in the same period of time in which she revolves round the sun. It will be remembered that some time ago he published observations tending to a similar conclusion with regard to Mercury.

ANTHROPOLOGICAL NOTES.

In the first two parts of the third volume of Dr. Schmeltz's Internationales Archiv für Ethnographie prominence is given to American subjects. Dr. Franz Boas, professor at the Clark University, Worcester, U.S.A., contributes a paper in English on the use of masks and head ornaments on the north-west coast of America, founded on his investigations among the Indians of British Columbia. He found the knowledge of the meaning of the masks which are objects of frequent occurrence in our museums was confined to a limited number of persons; that their use is closely connected with the clans or gentes of these people and with their secret societies; and that the meaning of each mask is not known out of the gens or society to which it belongs. The use of a peculiar kind of mask as a helmet belongs to the extreme northern part of the region, and does not, he thinks, extend very far south. Other masks he divides into two classes—dancing masks, and masks attached to housefronts and heraldic columns, the latter being all clan-masks, having reference to the crest of the house owner or post owner. Of the dancing masks some are also peculiar to clans, and these are of two kinds—those used at the festival at which property is given away, and those used at the winter dances for mimical performances representing the traditions of the clans. As to the use of masks in secret societies Dr. Boas acquired much interesting information. Herr H. Strebel, of Hamburg, contributes, in German, studies on the stone yokes found in Mexico and Central America, a possible use of which is indicated by ancient drawings representing human sacrifices, where an attendant holds down the neck of the victim with a yoke while the chief priest performs the operation of disembowelling. Thirty specimens of these objects from various museums are figured and fully described. Mr. S. W. Tromp contributes a description in Dutch of the clothing of a Dayak woman named Toekau, illustrated by her portrait. The lobes of the ears are pierced and largely distended by numerous rings corresponding with bracelets reaching to the elbow; the hands are tattooed; an ample girdle and necklace of beads confine gaily coloured garments, and the costume is crowned with a highly decorative hat. M. Kollman, in French, gives expression to the regret which anthropologists of all countries must feel at the manner in which the School of Anthropology of Paris suppressed the Chair of Pure Anthropology occupied with so much distinction by Dr. Topinard. On this subject we have received a pamphlet of forty pages, entitled La Société, l'Ecole, le Laboratoire, et le Musée Broca, in which Dr. Topinard reviews the history of these several institutions, and points out the grave issues that depend upon their traditions being respected.

The principal contents of the Journal of the Anthropological Institute for the present quarter are (1) the address of Dr. Beddoe, the President, in which he reviewed the recent advances of physical anthropology, especially as indicated by the Paris Exposition of 1889, and ably defended the anthropometric school, as against those who would be content to base their conclusions on the general impressions formed by observers rather than on actual measurement; (2) Mr. Beardmore's answers to Mr. J. G. Frazer's questions on the natives of Mowat in New Guinea; (3) Mr. S. G. Skertchley's descriptions of the syringes and drills used for fire-making in North Borneo; (4) Dr. Rink's argument as to the origin of the Eskimo drawn from the words used by them for seals and whales and their capture, with Dr. Rae's observations in answer.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—June 12.—The President in the chair.—Sir B. Baker, Mr. R. H. M. Bosanquet, Mr. S. H. Burbury, Mr. W. Gardiner, Dr. A. S. Lea, Major P. A. MacMahon, Prof. S. U. Pickering, Mr. I. Roberts, Mr. J. J. H. Teall, and Dr. R. T. Thorne were admitted into the Society.—The following papers were read: 'On a Redetermination of the Position of the Principal Line in the Spectrum of the Nebula of Orion, and on the Character of the Line,' 'Note on the Photographic Spectrum of the Great Nebula in Orion,' and 'On a New Group of Lines in the Photographic Spectrum of Sirius,' by Dr. Huggins and Mrs. Huggins.—'On the Spectra of Comet a, 1890, and the Nebula G.C. 4058,' by Prof. Lockyer.—'Preliminary Note on the Development of the Tuatara (Sphenodon punctatum),' by Prof. A. P. W. Thomas.—'On the Position of the Vocal Cords in Quiet Respiration of Man, and on the Reflex-tonus of their Abductor-muscles,' by Dr. F. Semon.—'A Record of the Results obtained by Electrical Excitation of the so-called Motor Cortex and Internal Capsule in an Orang-Outang (Simia satyrus),' by Dr. Beevor and Prof. Horsley.—and 'A Further Note on the Influence of Bile and its Constituents on Pancreatic Digestion,' by Drs. S. Martin and D. Williams.

GEOGRAPHICAL.—June 16.—Anniversary Meeting.—Sir M. E. Grant Duff, President, in the chair.—The following gentlemen were elected Fellows: Major Sir A. Lamb, Capt. E. O. V. Hal dane, Capt. M. G. Jackson, Rev. C. W. Barclay, Rev. T. C. V. Bastow, Rev. H. W. P. Richards, Messrs. J. T. Bent, I. E. Clifford, E. Clough, H. G. Holdsworth, G. P. Hunot, A. J. Jordan, W. E. Nicol, J. Rock, H. Seidel, G. E. Skerry, F. G. Smart, R. L. Smart, and H. Taylor.—The following gentlemen were elected as Council and officers for 1890-1: President, Sir M. E. Grant Duff; Vice-Presidents, F. Galton, Major-General Sir F. J. Goldsmid, Sir J. Hooker, Major-General Sir H. C. Rawlinson, General R. Strachey, and General Sir C. P. B. Walker; Treasurer, R. T. Cocks; Trustees, Lord Aberdare and Sir J. Lubbock; Hon. Secretaries, D. W. Freshfield and H. Seebohm; Foreign Secretary, Lord A. Russell; Councillors, Sir R. Alcock, J. T. Bent, W. T. Blanford, Sir G. F. Bowen, Hon. G. Curzon, R. N. Cust, Major L. Darwin, Sir A. Dent, Duke of Fife, Sir J. Kirk, Lieut.-General Sir P. S. Lumsden, Sir W. Mackinnon, General R. MacLagan, Clements R. Markham, A. P. Maudslay, Admiral Sir F. L. McClintock, C. E. Peck, Sir R. W. Rawson, P. L. Selater, S. W. Silver, and B. L. Smith.—The Royal Medals for the encouragement of geographical science and discovery were presented: the Patron's Medal to Emin Pasha, in recognition of the great services rendered by him to geography and the allied sciences by his explorations and researches in the countries east, west, and south of the Upper Nile, during his twelve years' administration of the Equatorial Province of Egypt, —the Founder's Medal to Lieut. F. E. Younghusband, for his journey across Central Asia in 1886-7, from Manchuria and Peking via Hami and Kashgar and over the Mustagh to Kashmir and India; and especially for the route-surveys and topographical notes made by him over a distance of seven thousand miles, the results of which have been of much value to the cartography of the regions traversed, as supplementing or correcting the previous route-maps of Prejevalsky and Carey,—the Murchison Grant for 1890 to Signor V. Sella in consideration of his recent journey in the Caucasus, and the advance made in our knowledge of the physical characteristics and the topography of the chain by means of his series of panoramic photographs taken above the snow-level from points to which his camera had to be conveyed by trained Alpine mountaineers, whom he took out with him for the purpose from North Italy,—the Cuthbert Peek Grant to Mr. E. C. Hore, for his

graphy residen munica him in Gill Me
expedi
ant ad knowle schol graphic for 188 on the deliver

ASTRO
Preside elected
A. S. V able d relativ spot h years, tively large c on the the res on fro red sp seeing by it.
if it c formul end of centr ing et about spot—
'On t
the U doubt for th
Oxford
the m by Pr and f
of 02 vard meth
Oxford
coinc error which entit
Spitt grap sorpt to th what to sh of th
the
the in co pose plac term
He star only who seri been figur
of are of t
the to b diff for liev bein dul
of this ord pon and neil so of sup
for det pe for Pl
for rec
Va log

for his valuable observations on the physical geography of Tanganyika made during his many years' residence on that lake, a summary of which, communicated by him to the Society, was published by him in the Proceedings for October, 1889,—and the Gill Memorial to Mr. C. M. Woodford, for his three expeditions to the Solomon Islands and the important additions made by him to our topographical knowledge and natural history of the islands.—The scholarships and prizes given by the Royal Geographical Society to students in Training Colleges for 1890 were also presented.—The annual address on the progress of geography during the year was delivered by the President.

ASTRONOMICAL.—June 13.—General Tennant, President, in the chair.—Dr. T. S. Sheldon was elected a Fellow.—Mr. Knobel read a paper by Mr. A. S. Williams on a coming conjunction of a remarkable dark spot on Jupiter with the red spot, and the relative altitudes of these objects. The great red spot has now been under close observation for twelve years, but very little is known as to its height relatively to the other markings on the planet. A very large dark spot has now been visible for some time on the southern belt, and it is gaining rapidly on the red spot. If the black spot continues to sweep on from east to west it must overtake and pass the red spot, and we shall then have an opportunity of seeing whether it covers the red spot or is covered by it. Mr. Williams calculates that the black spot, if it continues to remain visible and to progress uniformly, will be in conjunction with the following end of the red spot on the 29th of July, with the centre on the 28th of August, and with the preceding end on the 27th of September. It will thus take about two months to pass over or under the red spot.—Mr. Knobel read a paper by Prof. Pritchard 'On the Verification of the Constants employed in the Uranometria Nova Oxoniensis.' In view of the doubt cast by Dr. Spitta on the values he had adopted for the absorption of the wedge with which the Oxford measures had been made, he had compared the measures of 2,647 stars with the measures made by Prof. Pickering, and given in the Harvard volume, and found that there was only an average difference of 0.29 of a magnitude between the Oxford and Harvard measures. Considering that Prof. Pickering's method was entirely different from that used at Oxford, Prof. Pritchard thought this very striking coincidence proved that there could be no serious error in the value of the absorption of his wedge which he had adopted.—Capt. Abney read a paper entitled 'Note on the Photometric Scaling of Dr. Spitta's Wedge,' in which he described some photographic methods he had adopted for testing the absorption of the wedge used by Dr. Spitta. He came to the conclusion that Dr. Spitta's wedge was somewhat greenish and not of neutral tint, as he was able to show that it absorbed the light of different parts of the spectrum very differently.—Prof. Gylden, of the Observatory of Christiania, gave an account of the work in which his observatory has been occupied in connexion with the survey of the heavens proposed by the German Astronomical Society. The places of about four thousand stars have been determined in a zone extending from 65° to 70° north. He considered that the declinations of all these stars had been determined with a probable error of only about half a second.—Commander Defforges, who spoke in French, gave an account of a long series of pendulum observations on which he has been engaged with the object of determining the figure of the earth. He remarked on the importance of such observations, as all astronomical measures are ultimately referred to and depend upon measures of the earth's radius, and the earth is by no means the regular spheroid which it is frequently assumed to be. Unfortunately there have hitherto been great differences in the pendulum determinations of the force of gravity. This Commander Defforges believes is owing to a variety of causes, one of them being that the point of suspension from which a pendulum is hung is never absolutely fixed—the motion of the pendulum tends to swing its support, and this reacts on the swinging of the pendulum. In order to determine the small motions of the support he had attached two lenses, one to the support and another to an independent fixed object in its neighbourhood. On bringing the two lenses together, so that Newton's rings could be observed in the film of air between them, a very small motion of the support caused a considerable motion backwards and forwards of Newton's rings. In this way he could detect the motion produced in the support by a person walking up a mountain 500 metres away.—The following papers were taken as read: 'The Star Places of the Second General Melbourne Catalogue for 1880,' by Mr. A. M. W. Downing,—'On Star Correction Tables,' by Mr. W. H. Finlay,—'On the Variable Star U (Nova) Orionis,' by Mr. J. E. Gore,—'Comparison of the Greenwich Ten Year Catalogue with the Williamstown Right Ascensions of Polar Stars for 1885,' by Prof. Safford,—'Corrections to the Elements of the Orbit of Juno,' by Mr. A. M. W. Downing,—'On the Computation of the Equation of the Centre in Elliptic Orbits of Moderate Eccentricities,' and 'A Simple Solution of Kepler's Problem,' by Mr. A. Marth,—and 'Note on some Variable Stars near the Cluster 5M,' by Mr. A. A. Common.

STATISTICAL.—June 17.—Dr. T. G. Balfour, President, in the chair.—The paper read was 'An Examination of the Coal and Iron Production of the Principal Coal and Iron Producing Countries of the World, with reference to the English Coal Question,' by Mr. G. G. Chisholm.—Messrs. J. S. Jeans, H. M. Paul, J. Glover, R. Hamilton, and T. Freeman, Sir R. W. Rawson, and the President took part in the discussion that followed.

LINNEAN.—May 24.—Anniversary Meeting.—Mr. W. Carruthers, President, in the chair.—Messrs. W. West, J. B. Carruthers, and J. S. Turner were admitted Fellows.—The Treasurer presented his annual report duly audited, and the Secretary having announced the elections and deaths of Fellows during the last year, the President proceeded to deliver his annual address. In this he dealt with the distribution of British plants both before and after the glacial period, making special allusion to the discoveries of Mr. Reid amongst the vegetation of the Cromer Forest Bed, showing that the forms which have come down to us at the present day do not differ in any respect from the same species found in the glacial beds.—On a ballot taking place for new members of Council, the following were declared to be elected: Dr. P. H. Carpenter, Dr. J. W. Meiklejohn, Mr. E. B. Poulton, Mr. D. Sharp, and Prof. C. Stewart.—On a ballot taking place for President and officers, the following were declared to be elected: President, Prof. C. Stewart; Secretaries, Mr. B. D. Jackson and Mr. W. P. Sladen; Treasurer, Mr. F. Crisp.—The Linnean Society's Gold Medal for the year 1890 was then formally awarded and presented to Prof. Huxley for his researches in zoology.

June 5.—Prof. C. Stewart, President, in the chair.—Messrs. H. Gibson and W. F. Kirby were admitted and Messrs. W. H. Beeby and S. Gasking were elected Fellows of the Society.—The President then nominated as Vice-Presidents for the year Messrs. W. Carruthers, P. M. Duncan, J. G. Baker, and F. Crisp.—Mr. H. Little exhibited and made some remarks upon a photograph of a remarkable aroid, Amorphophallus titanum, which had flowered for the first time in this country.—Mr. J. Groves exhibited a specimen of an orobanche parasitic upon a pelargonium.—The following papers were read and discussed: 'On a Collection of Plants made by him in Madagascar,' by Mr. G. F. S. Elliot,—'On Weismann's Theory of Heredity applied to Plants,' by Rev. G. Henslow,—'Teratological Evidence as to Heredity of Acquired Conditions,' by Prof. Windle,—'On the Development of the Tetrasporangia in Rhabdochorton rothii, Naegeli,' by Mr. H. Gibson,—'On the Position of Chantreaux, with a Description of a New Species,' by Mr. G. Murray and Miss E. Barton,—'On the Development of the Cystocarp in Callophlyllis laciniata,' by Miss A. L. Smith,—and 'On the Cystocarps of some Genera of Floridæ,' by Mr. J. B. Carruthers.

ENTOMOLOGICAL.—June 4.—Lord Walsingham, President, in the chair.—Mr. G. W. Carter and Mr. R. Newstead were elected Fellows; and Mr. O. Goldthwait and Mr. J. W. Downing were admitted into the Society.—The Secretary exhibited, on behalf of Mr. J. Edwards, of Norwich, two specimens of Ilybius subaneus, Er., and a single specimen of Bideanus unistriatus, Schr.—Mr. Champion alluded to the fact that the only recorded British specimens of the first-mentioned beetle had been taken many years ago at Peckham.—Lord Walsingham referred to the list of Norfolk Coleoptera compiled some years ago by Mr. Crotch, which appears to have been lost sight of.—Mr. McLachlan alluded to the damage done by insects to orange trees in Malta, and stated that the Rev. G. Henslow had lately been studying the question. One of the chief predators was the widely-spread 'fly,' Ceratitis citriferda, well known as devastating the orange. He found, however, that another and more serious enemy was the larva of a large longicorn beetle (Cerambyx miles, Bon.), which bores into the lower part of the stem and down into the roots, making large galleries; in all probability the larva, or that of an allied species, is the true Cossus of the ancients.—Lord Walsingham stated that a species of Prays allied to P. oleellus and our common P. curtisellus was known to feed on the buds of the orange and lemon in Southern Europe.—The following papers were communicated, and were read by the Secretary: 'Notes on the Species of the Families Lyciæ and Lampyridæ contained in the Imperial Museum of Calcutta, with Descriptions of New Species, and a List of the Species at present described from India,' by the Rev. H. S. Gorham,—and 'A Catalogue of the Rhopaloceros Lepidoptera collected in the Shan States, with Notes on the Country and Climate,' by Mr. N. Manders. The latter paper contained an interesting description of the chief physical features of the Shan States and neighbouring parts of Burmah.

CHEMICAL.—June 5.—Dr. W. J. Russell, President, in the chair.—Messrs. W. B. Shuttlewood and H. R. Kenwood were formally admitted Fellows.—The following papers were read: 'The Production of Pure Metallic Copper in a Crystalline Condition,' by Mr. C. C. Duncan,—'The Action of Ethylic Oxalate on Camphor,' by Dr. J. B. Tingle,—'The Oxidation of Turpentine in Sunlight,' and 'The Structure of Cycloid Hydrocarbons,' by Mr. H. E. Armstrong,—'Tertiary Butyl Mercaptan,' by Dr. L. Dobbin,—and 'Desylacetophenone,' by Dr. A. Smith.

MATHEMATICAL.—June 12.—Mr. J. J. Walker, President, in the chair.—The President announced that the Council had unanimously awarded the De Morgan Memorial Medal to Lord Rayleigh for his writings on mathematical physics.—The following papers were read: 'On Simplicissima in Space of n Dimensions' (third paper), by Mr. W. J. C. Sharp,—'Rotatory Polarization,' by Dr. J. Larmor,—and 'Parabolic Note,' by Mr. R. Tucker.—Prof. Greenhill communicated a paper, by Prof. Mathews, on the expression of the square root of a quartic as a continued fraction, and one by Mr. R. Russell on modular equations.—The President gave a short sketch of a paper by Mr. A. R. Johnson on certain concomitants of a system of conics and quadrics, and on the calculation of the covariant S of the ternary quartic.

PHYSICAL.—June 6.—Prof. W. E. Ayrton, President, in the chair.—Mr. H. Tomlinson, F.R.S., read a paper 'On the Effect of Change of Temperature on the Villari Critical Point of Iron,' in continuation of the paper he read before the Society on the 21st of March.—A paper 'On the Diurnal Variations of the Magnet at Kew,' by Messrs. W. G. Robson and S. W. J. Smith, was communicated by Prof. Rüchler.

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.

- MON. Victoria Institute, 8.—On the Sites in the East earliest mentioned in Holy Writ, Mr. Horneuzd Hassan.
- TUES. Horticultural, 11; Lecture, 3.
- Statistical, 5.—Annual Meeting.
- Photographic, 8.
- Anthropological Institute, 8.—Notes, with Exhibition, on a Skeleton found at West Thurrock, Essex; and Two Skulls recently exhumed within City Limits, Mr. J. E. Price.
- WED. Ethnology of India, Mr. H. H. Baily.
- WED. Gymnædion, 8.—Annual Reunion and Conversation.
- FRI. United Service Institution, 3.—Spontaneous Combustion and Explosions in Coal Bunkers, Mr. V. B. Lewis.
- SAT. Society of Arts, 8.—Convivial Zone.
- Botanic, 52.—Election of Fellows.

Science Society.

The Hon. John Collier has just painted a new portrait of his father-in-law, Prof. Huxley.

The first meeting of the Museums Association, formed on the model of the Library Association, has been held at Liverpool this week.

A PROFESSOR of the Kharkof University, M. Krasnof, accompanied by four students, will set out this summer on a scientific tour in the Caucasus, which they will thoroughly explore from an historical and scientific standpoint. The expedition will visit the Kazbek glaciers, and proceed to Kutais and Svanetia.

FINE ARTS

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.—The ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTIETH EXHIBITION IS NOW OPEN.—5, Pall Mall East, from 10 till 6.—Admission 1s; Catalogue 1s.

ALFRED D. FRIFP, R.W.S., Secretary.

THE LEGEND of the BRIAR ROSE, painted by E. BURNE JONES, A.R.A.

THE LEGEND of the BRIAR ROSE—THE EXHIBITION of Mr. BURNE JONES'S Four Pictures IS NOW OPEN at Messrs Thos. Agnew & Sons' Old Bond Street Galleries, 39, Old Bond Street, W.—Admission, 1s. 10 to 6 o'clock.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

In Royal Academy Antics, by H. Furniss (Cassell & Co.), which contains over sixty clever illustrations, Mr. Furniss has unluckily written in such haste and wrath that he has omitted to inform himself of some of the commonest facts in the history of the institution he desires to reform. Beginning at the beginning, he assails everybody concerned with art more than one hundred and fifty years ago, and sneers at the Dilettanti Society; at Hogarth, who denounced academies generally, but, dying years before the present Academy was founded, cannot be called as a witness against its members, their aims or conduct; at Dalton, George III., Reynolds, B. West, and, indeed, every President down to Sir F. Leighton. He has collected a number of stories concerning the foundation of the Academy not one of which, even if it were true—and a large number of them are due to the imagination of its enemies—has anything to do with the Academy of the present day. The account of the split among the artists exhibiting at the Society of Arts in 1760 contains several errors, and, with a bitterness that would almost lead one to suppose that Mr. Furniss has some real or fancied wrong to avenge, makes much of the case of that "miserable wretch of a bad painter" Mauritius Lowe, who in 1769 received the Academy's first gold medal for painting, and whose picture of 'The Deluge' the Council rejected, but afterwards at the instigation of Reynolds, prompted by Johnson, agreed to hang in a room by itself, where it was speedily damned. This was so far from being a "low proceeding" that it was a generous and wise one. The Council gave Lowe what he asked, and acknowledged his claim upon them as the winner of their gold medal; but they broke their own rules. When, as in Gainsborough's case, they adhered to their rules, and refused to be bullied even by one of the most eminent and popular of their own body, Mr. Furniss is equally displeased. The story of George III.'s patronage of West is told as if it were a ground of complaint against the Academy, which had nothing whatever to do with it. The king may have been foolish in employing West, but he certainly did not give West "many commissions at extravagant prices," and he undoubtedly acted from noble motives. Wyatt, to whom Mr. Furniss attributes the dismissal of West, was as much an Academician as the painter who is here described as the inventor of that "overdose of West's Penny Royal, the noted Yankee quack nostrum," a nice specimen of the slang which pervades this brochure. The story, even as we have it here, of Lawrence's election as an Associate is not discreditable to the Academicians, who were compelled by the king to elect him; but as Lawrence was born in May, 1769, he was in November, 1791, considerably over twenty-one years of age. When twenty-four he would have been eligible under the regular rules, and if the two parties who were alone concerned agreed to abrogate a rule they had established it was hardly a very black transaction. If Lawrence did exhibit ten pictures in 1792 he was within his right, and Reynolds and others often exhibited greater numbers. As an "outsider" Lawrence had contributed thirteen portraits in 1789, twelve in 1790, and eleven in 1791. It is therefore rather to his credit that he never afterwards sent so many. As to the elections of Landseer and Maclise to the presidency, Mr. Furniss's account, so far as it is correct, is to the credit of all concerned. The members undoubtedly desired to elect them, and each of them declined the honour from a just sense of his own unfitness. Maclise did not "refuse the job" (it was, in fact, the reverse of a "job") because the post was "unpopular," but because he disliked office, wanted to paint, and could not make speeches. It was the same with Landseer. The assertion that Sir F. Leighton is a "figure-head" is a ludicrous statement. The author shows curious ignorance of the internal economy of the schools at Burlington House, and of the nature of the Visitors' office and influence. He makes a strange mistake when he declares that the Academy lives rent free, that it maintains "a handful of scholars and pensioners," and that it remains unchanged "after 120 years." The charge that the Academicians "show no balance sheet" does not seem relevant to a body which deals with its own funds and receives nothing from the nation. Besides, it is true only in the letter. From the account of the career of the late Mr. H. Dawson, a worthy and able landscape painter, it might be supposed that the Academy had ruined him! The fact is that of sixty-six pictures he exhibited before 1880 twenty-eight were at the Academy, thirty-three at the British Institution, and five at Suffolk Street. On p. 82 Mr. Furniss says: "The Royal Academy treats the Press with marked contempt. It is with difficulty Press tickets [i.e., for the Press private view] are obtained. Red-tapeism arm in arm with flunkeyism is rampant at Burlington House. My readers will hardly credit the fact that the proprietor of our aristocratic daily paper, himself a leader of society, applied for a Press ticket, so that he might accompany his art critic, and was refused, as 'one ticket had already been sent to the paper.'" It seems to us that in declining to accept the "leader of society" as an art critic the Academy paid the best possible compliment to the real critic, who was probably not a "figure-head." The fact is, however, that too many of these so-called Press tickets are now given; and even Mr. Furniss stings in what he calls the "wild career" of his onslaught to complain of the "old ladies, young girls, schoolboys, curates, and other mixtures" who figure as art critics. Of course many of the reforms mentioned in this pamphlet as desirable are wished for by all lovers of art, and have been constantly urged upon the Academy by others and ourselves. Much had been done before Mr. Furniss began throwing mud at those who desire to do right as seriously as he can, and yet refuse to pursue it by the methods of 'Royal Academy Antics.'

THE three parts, completing the work, of Royal Academy Pictures, 1890 (Cassell & Co.), are before us, and, even without regard to the smallness of the price at which they are published, may be held to form, with some luckless exceptions, an excellent record of the exhibition at Burlington House. Among the best cuts are 'On the Temple Steps,' after Mr. Poynter; 'The Mirror,' by Mr. H. Thornycroft; Sir J. E. Millais's 'The Moon is Up'; Mr. Woolner's 'Sir T. Elder'; Mr. Parton's 'In the Heart of Normandy'; Mr. Prinsep's 'Diva Theodora'; Mr. Davis's 'Placid Morning on the Wye'; M. Wauters's 'M. H. Spielmann, Esq.'; and Mr. Aumonier's 'Silver Lining of the Cloud.' It is worth while noticing how often, when they are translated into black and white by means which are not artistic, some of the worst pictures, for handling, bad colour, indifferent drawing, paintiness, and crude surfaces, are made to look quite beautiful in these cuts, because the disposition of their masses and the lines of composition are broad and simple. It is right to say that a considerable proportion of these cuts are only good enough to serve as memoranda of the pictures, some of which we should be better without.

London Pictures, drawn with Pen and Pencil, by the Rev. R. Lovett (Religious Tract Society), comprises, besides many excellent and correct cuts, a clear account of most of the chief buildings and historic sites in the metropolis. As a collection of bright and popular sketches, historical and personal, replete with sympathy, and written with good taste, we could not wish for anything better. Occasionally the compiler nods, as when, p. 94, he casts doubts on the veracity of Fitz Stephen in saying that the mortar of the ekeinte of the Tower was tempered with the blood of beasts. The practice was in many instances adopted, and the chronicler had certainly not the least idea that he was making a sensational statement.

THE CARLISLE GEMS.

It is understood that the Trustees of the British Museum have made arrangements for the purchase of the Carlisle collection of engraved gems, which for about a hundred and fifty years have been among the most precious ornaments of Castle Howard, and yet so far as the public and dilettanti are concerned remain almost unknown, and are to this day practically undescribed and unillustrated. The greater number will, of course, pass to the Department of Greek and Roman Antiquities, which receives not fewer than 166 examples. Thirty or forty more, of inferior value and less account as antiquities per se, are to be handed over to Mr. Franks's comprehensive department, where their settings and other characteristics entitle them to a home. The collection, mainly formed by the fourth Earl of Carlisle, consists chiefly of Roman and Græco-Roman relics. There are likewise some very fine examples of Cinquecento engraving in the richly enamelled settings. Among the Græco-Roman works are specimens of the skill of Dioscorides, Heius, Sosus, Sostratus, and other less-known engravers. A figure of Mercury by Dioscorides is one of the most valuable in the collection, the signature of the artist being above suspicion, which is not often the case in gems bearing his name. Heius is represented by a delicate archaic Diana with a stag at her side, and this is the more interesting because it seems to be the original of an ancient paste which the Trustees obtained many years ago (we described it at the time) with the Blacas Collection. Since that went to the Museum no important addition of the same kind and comparable to that now in question has been made. The only known record of the history of the Carlisle collection as such is in a letter of Horace Walpole, where, with much sarcastic humour, he described how the gems passed from Cardinal Ottoboni to the ancestor of the present Earl of Carlisle.

Until they were removed to the Museum these treasures had been for a long time in safe keeping at Coutts's Bank, and were very rarely seen. They were not described by Mr. King. In the early part of this century Tassie made casts of about ten of them, including the Mercury by Dioscorides. It was from one of the casts of Tassie's mould that Furtwangler described the relic. A work of the time of Augustus, it is engraved on a golden sard, and represents the deity at whole length, standing, holding in one hand the head of a ram, in the other hand his caduceus. The signature, the most interesting part of this work, is evidently formed of a series of dots, some of which remain distinct, while others have been run together in forming the letters. Another remarkable instance is the head, in profile to our left, and in rather high relief, of an unknown successor of Alexander. It is a chalcedony. The face is distinguished by the naturalistic style, bold, searching, and thoroughly accomplished, in which it is executed. The modelling and crisp finish of the lips, hair, and chin bespeak the vigorous and learned handling of a master. On the chin is a large wart. The head fills the field of about five-eighths of an inch in its short diameter. There is no signature. It is in perfect condition. The next instance looks like a portrait of Mæcenæ, and is of his time. It is of jasper, a head in profile to our right. Carved with much freedom and boldness, it is far less excellent than the portrait last named. Also of the time of Augustus, and signed "Sosos" on the left of the head, is a profile to our left of a head in a bold and free style. The execution of the features and hair is very fine. A cameo signed "Sostratos" shows Cupid with a chariot drawn by two panthers, one of whom the god is guiding with a rein. It is a design of wonderful spirit, and the execution is fine, but not first rate. The figures are cut in a white layer of onyx, on a ground of rather dull sard. Next we have an intaglio of Victory slaying a bull, a golden sardonxy. It is signed "Sostratos," but the execution is different from the last. A cameo of sardonxy depicts a satyr seated with folded arms. It has been broken and the legs are lost, the prominent parts are worn, but the portions protected by the higher parts, i.e., the advanced limbs, show how fine the original surface must have been. A cameo of Cupid as a winged child seated, and with a torch singeing the wings of Psyche, represented as a butterfly, is noteworthy and very spirited and playful indeed. It dates from the earlier half of the first century A.D. Of the same period is a sard of a cow in profile walking to our left. On an onyx is a good and vigorous satyric mask in full face of the same period, cut in the white layer. Leda, sitting on her heels, the swan approaching her closely and pressing her lips with his beak while she throws off her mantle, is most charming and animated. Dating from the same time as the last, it is cut in the white stratum of an onyx. We next notice a bearded head in full face with a satyric mask. Then comes the whole-length figure of Philoctetes, leaning on a staff, limping as he goes, and holding a bow. It is of the archaic type of the Augustan age, signed "Seleuk[os]."

Among the largest camei in existence (5 in. by 3 in.) is that before us, a sardonxy bearing the profile to our left of Julia, the daughter of Augustus, with a diadem and fillet. Mr. Murray identified the portrait by comparing this gem with a coin of hers on which there is a quiver similar to that seen behind the head on the gem. The brown layer of the sard has been utilized for the hair and diadem. In this respect it resembles the Blacas Augustus, now in the Museum, in which the regis on his breast is represented in the same manner. A remarkable work comprises, superimposed the one on the other, two heads in profile to our right, and cut in a stone similar to the above. Julia, as Minerva, appears in front, while behind is Livia, her step-mother, as Juno. It is cut in an agate and in rather flat relief. A cameo follows of Augustus, or Tiberius, in full face; the nose has been restored. The execution of the flesh, laurel, and hair is very beautiful indeed. The ivory-white onyx has been cut down to the translucent ground. We may also mention Julia as Diana, and a fragment of sileni drawing a car.

NEW PRINTS.

'A LADY WITH A FAN,' No. 160 at the Royal Academy Winter Exhibition of 1889, the property of the Queen, one of the finest Rembrandts in the world, was painted in 1641, the first transitional period of the master's art, and is in perfect condition. While reviewing the exhibition we gave its history, and endeavoured to do justice to its wonderful merits. We are greatly obliged to Messrs. Obach & Co. for having employed an etcher as competent and sympathetic as Heer P. J. Arendzen to reproduce it on a scale sufficient to display it properly, yet not too large, i.e., 20 in. by 16½ in. We have a proof on vellum (with the remarque, a fan lying closed upon a book) quite worthy of the picture it represents with veracity, grace, spirit, and completeness. The execution is minute and exhaustive, clear, firm, and brilliant, yet as soft as this softest of Rembrandts demands. The luminosity of the carnations, their delicate modelling, upon which the painter expended his utmost skill, the wealth of detail in the lace collar, cuffs, and fan, have all been secured by the engraver, who has imparted to his work all the breadth of the original.

From the same firm we have received an artist's proof on vellum (with the remarque, a line of music) of a portrait of Beethoven etched by Heer Carel L. Dako, whose plates after Rembrandt, Hals, and Van Dyck are, and deserve to be, known to all the world. He produced this intensely pathetic and powerful likeness of the somewhat Cromwell-like composer from studying the mask which was made from his face during life, and F. Klein's bust. These are, undoubtedly, the best authorities an engraver could, under the circumstances, desire. The portrait is a bust, about two-thirds life size, and the face is in three-quarters view to our left. It is a vigorous and yet elaborately finished piece of work—strong, rich in tone and colour, and as an etching simply a marvel, the equal to which, seeing it is not due to the life or a picture, we have not seen for many a day.

Messrs. Dowdeswell have sent us an artist's proof of an unusually large etching, in a quasi-mezzotint manner (practically an aquatint), by Mr. Hole, after J. F. Millet's vigorous and massive picture 'The Woodsawyers,' belonging to Mr. Constantine A. Ionides, and showing two men vigorously dividing, with a large cross-cut saw, the trunk of a huge oak which lies on the ground between them. The design of the figures is as full of energy as anything Millet ever produced; the composition is highly characteristic of the painter's remarkable power in that respect; and the effect of strong sunlight, which is concentrated on the white shirt of the nearer man, diffused on the bole of the tree, and contrasted with the deep gloom of the shadowy forest behind the group, is such as Millet triumphed in. Mr. Hole's peculiar style exactly suits him, and he translates Millet with rare intelligence, and we have nothing but praise for this important plate, except a regret that the nearer sawyer's right leg is too dark and its shadows are a little opaque. The same publishers have forwarded an artist's proof of an etching (or aquatint), by the same hand, after Heer M. Maris's picture 'He is coming!' which represents a mediæval damsel seated at an embroidery-frame, gorgeously attired, and with her light tresses flowing on her shoulders. She listens to the step of the approaching lover. It is a richly coloured and sumptuously toned piece, if not very intelligible, and the etching does justice, perhaps more than justice, to its model. Engraving so well after Millet, Mr. Hole ought not to waste his time upon Maris.

EXCAVATIONS AT MEGALOPOLIS.

Sparta, June 2, 1890.

THIS season's excavation at Megalopolis came to an end the day before yesterday—May 31st. Latterly we were hindered again by very heavy rain, which reduced the ground to an altogether unworkable condition; we even had water a couple of feet deep standing in the orchestra. Now, however, we have sunk our channel to a level below that of Antiochus's ὄψαρος (see last report), so the water difficulty will not recur.

Our new central trench failed to find the θυμέλη or any trace of it, but it did find a new line of walls, the existence of which we had not suspected, nearly 20 ft. in advance of the Greek stage front. This is the front of the Roman stage. It is of very bad workmanship, but in excellent preservation, and adds greatly to the historical completeness of the theatre. Its discovery made it necessary to widen the trench which contained the Greek stage; and now the entire space between the Greek and Roman stages is clear of earth. By this time we have removed so much earth from the orchestra and stage buildings that the expense of clearing the whole will not be very great, and we hope we shall be allowed to do so next season.

The line of wall which we have just laid bare is at a considerably lower level than that of the Greek stage; but the Roman stage was supported on columns resting on this wall, and several of the lower drums of these columns remain in situ. They are very ugly columns, with a projecting fillet on either side, rather suggesting the notion that the intervening spaces were filled with wooden panels. They are unfluted, but the beginnings of flutings are visible at the bottom of each column, round the front half only; the hinder portion was never intended to be fluted at all, and is left quite rough.

Another discovery made since our last report is a pair of bases—one just inside each horn of the stone border of the orchestra. One of these supports a higher cylindrical base, which no doubt held a statue, and which is inscribed with the names of the dedicator, Εὐμαρίδας, and the sculptor (Νίκιππος) of Megalopolis. The first three letters of the sculptor's name are not absolutely certain.

We have also probed high up in the auditorium, where there is a broad horizontal line which we have always taken for a διάζωμα. Here we found nothing in situ, but we turned out many blocks of stone, several being seats, one big block perhaps coming from the back of the διάζωμα, and another being probably, but not certainly, a step. We were anxious to find traces of steps at this point, for with ten κλίμακες below the διάζωμα there would probably be nineteen above, and one of these would be exactly in the centre, where we dug our trench.

Mr. Woodhouse is at this moment in another part of Greece, or would join me in signing this report.

W. LORING,

Student of the British School at Athens.

SALES.

MESSRS. CHRISTIE, MANSON & WOODS sold on the 12th and 13th inst. the following, from the collection of Mr. E. Joseph. Old French miniatures: Napoleon I., by Isabey, in oval metal-gilt locket, chased with a trophy of arms, 26*l.*; Portrait of a Lady, with a wreath of roses in her hair, leaning on a pedestal, with doves, 25*l.*; Henri II. of France conferring the Order of the St. Esprit in a Chapter of the Order, 50*l.*; Prince Eugene Beauharnais, an oval enamel in gilt frame, 31*l.* Old English miniatures: Lady Coventry, in Turkish costume, a large oblong miniature, in metal-gilt frame, 24*l.*; Portrait of the Poet Gay, in oval gold locket, with border of diamonds, 25*l.*; Portrait of the Lady Arabella Stuart, whole length, in pale-blue and white dress, 42*l.* English miniatures: Mary, Countess of Tankerville, daughter to George, Earl of Berkeley, a large oval miniature, 28*l.* The unrivalled Collection of Miniatures by R. Cosway and contemporary miniaturists, exhibited at Windsor Castle by request of Her Majesty the Queen, 9,765*l.* An Oblong Casket of Ebony, forming an inkstand, 157*l.*

The same auctioneers sold on the 14th inst. the following pictures, from the collection of the late Mr. G. Perkins: J. Both, Muleteers passing through a bold Rocky Country on a fine Summer Morning, 997*l.* A. Cuyp, A Herd of Seven Cows grouped together on a Bank, in the foreground of a landscape, 997*l.*; Woman and Child, 525*l.* W. De Heusch, The Sportsman's Return, 136*l.* M. Hobbema, A Landscape, 3,465*l.*; A View of the Château of Kostverloren, on the Amstel, 336*l.* G. Metsu, The Music Lesson, a composition of three figures in an interior, 609*l.* Moucheron and Lingelbach, An Italian Landscape, 230*l.* A. Van Ostade, A Village Interior, 787*l.*; Outside the Inn, 320*l.* P. Potter, Cattle Reposing, 115*l.* Rembrandt, Portrait of a Gentleman, 1,627*l.* J. Ruysdael, A Landscape representing a Bold Rocky Scene, 735*l.* Jan Steen, The Skittle Players, 693*l.* D. Teniers, The Guard-Room, 1,470*l.*; Playing "La Morra," 735*l.*; A Flemish Interior, 430*l.* A. Van de Velde, The Little Farm, 861*l.*; The Flight into Egypt, 325*l.* W. Van de Velde, A View on a River in Holland, 892*l.*; A Rough Sea, 997*l.* P. Wouvermans, The Watering Place, 430*l.*; The Farrier, 325*l.*; The Return from Market, 346*l.*; The Manor House, 220*l.* Barbarelli, The Saviour of the World, 294*l.* Carlo Dolci, "Ecce Homo," 535*l.* Murillo, St. Gregory, 630*l.*; St. Francis of Assisi, 630*l.* Pordenone, Portrait of a Venetian Nobleman, half length, 288l. Zuccarelli, Country Pleasures and The Fishermen, 147l. T. Gainsborough, A Road in the Forest, 346l. P. Nasmyth, A View on the Medway, 399l. Sir J. Reynolds, Meditation, 682l. Sir D. Wilkie, "Guess my Name!" 598l. R. Wilson, A River Scene, with Ruins, 199l; A Landscape, sunset, 199l; A Landscape, 231l. Claude, An Italian Landscape, 378l.

On the 12th inst. the pictures belonging to the collection of Senateur Crabbe, of Brussels, were sold in Paris. Among the chief works were Teniers's Interior of a Kitchen, 7,000 fr.; Gallait's Jeanne la Folle (till now sold as a masterpiece), 3,050 fr., or less than half the price at which it was put up; Leys's En Ronde, 8,500 fr.; Decamps's Mendicants, 9,800 fr., considerably more than it was put up for; a drawing of the Zuider Zee, by M. Meissonier, put up for 12,000 fr., fetched 9,000 fr.; Van Goyen's Winter in Holland, 9,000 fr.; J. Stevens's Dog and the Glass, 10,500 fr., for the Brussels Gallery; A Young Girl, by Greuze, 17,500 fr.; Halt of an Arab Caravan, by Fromentin, 42,000 fr. (put up at 30,000 fr.); The Oaks, by T. Rousseau, fetched 34,000 fr.; Ophelia, by M. Alfred Stevens, 29,000 fr.; Delacroix's Tiger Hunt, 76,000 fr.; and Rembrandt's Portrait of an Admiral, 106,500 fr.

Fine-Art Gossip.

BOTH the Salons now open in Paris will be closed on the 30th inst.; that is, unless the desire expressed by many that the exhibition on the Champ de Mars may remain open for two weeks longer be granted. There can be no doubt of the pecuniary success of the new Salon, but it is evident that you cannot create fine art by multiplying exhibitions. Sculptures, pastels, and engravings, which have always been among the chief glories of the older Salon, are comparatively poorly represented in the Champ de Mars, where Impressionism is rife, both in its good and bad phases. There is no lack of bad and dull art in the new gallery, while there is more of it in the older one than usual. It is a mistake to suppose that the new exhibition has been the occasion of drawing from their seclusion the masters who for many years have refused to contribute to the Palais de l'Industrie. Some of the ablest who send to the Champ de Mars send second-rate specimens. Apart from this it can hardly be said that, technically speaking, the new Salon has, as yet, justified its pretensions, least of all in sculpture and engraving. As to the last, the collection in the Champs Élysées is more than usually admirable.

THE annual general meeting of the Society for the Preservation of the Monuments of Ancient Egypt will be held on Wednesday, July 9th, under the presidency of the Earl of Wharfedale. The place of the meeting is not yet announced.

ON Friday next Messrs. Christie, Manson & Woods will sell sixty-two drawings and pictures by Turner, the property of Mr. Ayscough Fawkes, of Farnley Hall, Otley, parts of the famous collection we described at some length in "The Private Collections of England," No. XLVI. to No. LI. inclusive (Athen. Nos. 2709, 2710, 2711, 2712, 2715, and 2716). Among these works are the incomparable drawings made during a voyage up the Rhine in 1819, thirty-five in all, bought en bloc by the late Mr. Walter Fawkes immediately on Turner's landing in England and his arrival at Farnley Hall in the above-named year, then mounted in a case, and kept together. They were publicly shown for the first time at the Academy Winter Exhibition in 1889, and are nearly all of the same size, 7½ in. by 12½ in. Besides these the Turners include "London, from No. 45, Grosvenor Place," "Windermere," "Ullswater," "Fountains Abbey," "Loch Fyne," "Vevey," "Source of the Avernion," "Rome from Monte Mario," "Rome from the Pincian Hill," "Stonehenge," "Lake of Lucerne," "Mont Blanc from the Val D'Aosta," "Mount Vesuvius in Eruption," and others. Among the pictures are "The Lake of Geneva," "The Victory returning from Trafalgar," and a small replica of "The Sun rising through Mist" which is in the National Gallery. The Duke of Somerset's so-called Stover Collection will be sold by the same firm on Saturday next, and comprises drawings ascribed to Rembrandt, "Twelve Figures before a House" and "The Head of a Man," by Da Vinci, which belonged to Reynolds. Among the pictures are Raeburn's portrait of Prof. Playfair; "The Dairy Farm," by P. Potter (Smith, No. 59); Hobbema's "Woody Landscape"; "A Village Scene," by A. Van Ostade; Van Dyck's "Henrietta Maria," from Hamilton Palace; "Two Boys," by Egmont Van der Neer; and other works attributed to Bronzino, D. Teniers, Berchem, Rubens, Rembrandt, Giotto, Raphael, J. Ruysdael, and Guido.

MESSRS. JARROLD & SONS are publishing by subscription "The Church Bells of Suffolk," by Dr. Raven, of Emmanuel College, Cambridge.

THE forthcoming number of the Reliquary will contain, among other articles, an illustrated one, by Canon Scott Robertson, on Archbishop Hubert Walter and the discoveries made in opening his tomb in March, 1890. The following contributions will also appear in the same number: "On the Diary of a London Citizen, with Extracts from the Diary of Members of the Lever Family," by Mr. A. Wallis, and an article "On the Guilds of Reading," by the Rev. P. W. Ditchfield.

AMERICAN collectors and amateurs have succeeded in forming a fine-art society, which is intended to hold a similar position at New York to the Burlington Fine-Arts Club in London; it has, indeed, been planned on the lines of that institution. It is proposed to hold exhibitions of loan collections at stated intervals. A special feature of the scheme is the foundation of an art library.

THE recent statement in the St. James's Gazette that the French Government had decided to abandon the national manufactory of porcelain at Sèvres, and that the establishment would pass into the hands of a private company, is entirely erroneous. Our contemporary is also mistaken in supposing that the Sèvres factory is conducted at a loss to the French nation of 25,000l. annually. On the contrary, it makes a profit of 6,000l. per annum, besides furnishing the splendid vases which are given as presents to royal and distinguished personages by the Republic.

FOR the first time the Médaille d'Honneur of the Salon has been awarded to a landscape painter, the renowned M. F. L. Français, who was born in 1814 at Plombières (Vosges), and was a pupil of MM. Gigoux and Corot successively. He made his début in 1837 with "Une Chanson sous les Saules," to which H. Baron added the figures, and has, both in France and England, since exhibited a considerable number of pictures it has been our pleasure to admire. In 1841 he obtained a Médaille of the Third Class; in 1848, 1855, and 1867 Médailles of the First Class; in 1853 he was made a Knight of the Legion of Honour, an Officer in 1867. He had a Médaille d'Honneur at the Exposition Universelle, 1878. The present year's distinction has been allotted to the smaller of M. Français's contributions, No. 962, "Matinée Brumaise, Environs de Paris," a fine work of its kind, but neither the best landscape in the Salon nor the painter's masterpiece. We rejoice to think that the Médaille d'Honneur is given in recognition of the past rather than because No. 962 possesses superlative merits. This Médaille was twice refused to Corot.

THE death, on the 6th inst., of the well-known French etcher M. Abel Lurat is announced. He engraved, says Le Journal des Arts, many portraits and pictures of genre by MM. Landelle, Toulmouche, Perrault, Chaplin, Carolus-Duran, and others, and in 1876 he obtained a Médaille of the Third Class for two reproductions: "La Méditation," by M. Vély, and "Chevaux de Halage," after Decamps.

SOME small improvements have been made in the dark ante-room at the Louvre by which you pass to the salon carré of French paintings. About a year ago we referred to the unfortunate neglect of the modern masterpieces in this dismal ante-room, and prayed for their better treatment.

THE place of the late J. R. Herbert, R.A., as Corresponding Member of the Académie des Beaux-Arts has been filled by the election of Mr. Herkomer.

THE wing of the new Archæological Museum at Constantinople which is intended for the housing of the sarcophagi from Sidon and other places is ready, and will be presently opened to the public. In the neighbourhood of Beyrout a large grotto has, it is reported, been discovered near the coast which contains five sarcophagi of extraordinary beauty. The walls of the grotto are, it is declared, covered with mosaic paintings. Among them is the figure of a lady who, from the inscriptions accompanying it, is supposed to be a Greek princess. The sarcophagi are to be removed to the Imperial Museum at Constantinople.

MR. CHARLES I. GEDGE, of Nebraska city, U.S., suggests in reference to our question, pp. 475 and 476, ante, as to the meaning of the gold colander in the hand of Queen Elizabeth's portrait, No. 328 of the late Tudor Exhibition, that "it may be meant to represent such a vessel as that in which the Vestal Virgin, when falsely accused of unchastity, raised water from the Tiber and held it over her head without losing a drop. A gold colander would signify a royal Vestal." The suggestion is ingenious, and not out of keeping with the ornate and "parabolic" taste of Elizabeth's later days, and she, or rather her flatterers, often professed to illustrate in her portraits the glories of chastity—the frequent employment of the ermine is an instance of this. But it is one thing to commend chastity and another thing to repel an accusation of unchastity. Who in her lifetime would have dared accuse the "Lioness of England" of unchastity? Besides, the ermine signifies not physical chastity only, but purity in general. A notion prevails that Queen Elizabeth desired to be flattered by her painters. Of this there is not the slightest evidence, but very much to the contrary. She was probably too sensible of her own dignity to descend to anything of the kind. The idea is doubtless due to misreadings of painted allegories in which she figured; for example, the "Queen Elizabeth" at Lord Methuen's, mentioned by us, p. 475, col. 2, in which she is crowned by angels, while Time sleeps by the side of her throne. The fact is we moderns are apt to get out of our depth in examining the allegorical whims and fooleries of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries in portraiture, and to suspect profundities where there are really none. The gold colander in Earl Beauchamp's picture was probably nothing more recondite than an emblem of that housewifely thrift the great queen inculcated and in her own life practised, and of the nicety which was amusingly indicated in the order given (was it not to Dr. Dee?) that one of her would-be hosts must make his house clean, "because her majesty cannot abide a bad smell." In the so-called "Portrait of Queen Jane Seymour" (Tudor, 117) there is a gold pot in the right hand, its cover in the left. As to Queen Elizabeth's portraits, we must remember that nearly every picture of an elderly lady with an aquiline nose of her time is ascribed to Gloriana herself. Women dressed after her, just as old gentlemen dressed after the Duke of Wellington, and by-and-by all the old fogies' portraits will be ascribed to him, much as the pictures of the superannuated dames are given to her.

DR. STAÏS has now published his official report on the excavations of the tumulus of Velanidiza, which would appear to be anterior to the Persian wars. The tumulus was surrounded by a peribolus made of large square blocks of stone with alternate bricks of terracotta. Within were found nineteen tombs dug out on the level ground. Of the three most ancient ones, two are joined together, having been originally covered, and contained remains of charcoal used in burning the bodies, while the third seems made for a more important personage, who was buried intact in a wooden coffin. Remains of wooden coffins were found in five of the other tombs. The barrow appears to have been heaped up immediately after the burial of the third body, the other tombs having been made by removing the earth at the outer rim. Fragments of inscriptions and small vases or lekylthi with black and red figures, or even without ornament, prove the great age of these tombs, which probably appertained to a phratia of the demos of Phegous, to which the locality belonged.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—'La Favorite,' 'Le Nozze di Figaro.'

ST. JAMES'S HALL.—Richter Concerts.

THE début of Mlle. Richard in Donizetti's opera 'La Favorite' on Friday last week was such an unequivocal success that many must have wondered why this artist, who for the last thirteen years has been a distinguished ornament of the Paris Opéra stage, should not have appeared in London at an earlier date. The explanation is simple: Mlle. Richard will only sing in her own language, and Mr. Harris is the first manager who has had the courage to break away from the tyranny of the Italian tongue. 'La Favorite,' produced in its present form, with its fine fourth act, at the Académie in 1840, is essentially a French opera, though by an Italian composer. For some years, however, it has been declining in favour, and it does not seem probable that even with so effective a Léonore as Mlle. Richard it will again become popular in London. The success of the débutante, however, was immediate and decisive. Her voice is a full rich mezzo-soprano, magnificent in quality in the medium register, but a little harsh above f. Her method is unexceptionable, and not only in voice quality, but in appearance, she bears some resemblance to the late Mlle. Tietjens. Her engagement for the rôle of Fidès in 'Le Prophète' showed managerial foresight, and a very fine performance may be confidently anticipated. Reverting for an instant to 'La Favorite,' M. Montariol took the part of Fernand at a few hours' notice in the place of M. Ybos, and is, therefore, absolved from criticism. M. Cabalet, owing to his persistent tremolo, was unsatisfactory as Alphonse, but Signor Abramoff was an excellent Balthazar, and Mlle. Bauermeister, who seems to enjoy the gift of perpetual youth, was wholly acceptable as Inès. Though mounted for but one performance, the staging of the opera showed considerable care.

The performance of 'Le Nozze di Figaro' on Wednesday can only command moderate praise. Its familiar features were the pleasant Susanna of Miss Ella Russell, the admirable Figaro of Signor d'Andrade, and the over-accentuated Cherubino of Madame Scalchi. Why this artist should transpose her airs a third lower, and then insert a high g not to be found in the score, passes comprehension. Madame Tavary as the Countess was a little disappointing. She sang with excellent taste, but she revived affectations of a sort which we hoped were nearly extinct. M. Dufriehe was rather lugubrious as the Count, though happily he moderated his tremolo to a considerable extent. The accompaniments were played with almost excessive delicacy, the strings being at times nearly inaudible.

The favourable opinion formed of Mr. Leonard Borwick as a pianist when he played Schumann's Concerto at the Philharmonic Concerts was more than confirmed on Monday at the Richter Concerts. The task he set himself on this occasion was one of no small magnitude, Brahms's Concerto in D minor, Op. 15, being one of the most difficult as it is one of the most elaborate and abstruse of modern compositions for the pianoforte. Musicians will hold it in increasing respect, for it greatly improves on acquaintance; but a miscellaneous audience hearing it for the first time could not possibly grasp its meaning or appreciate its beauties, which do not lie on the surface. It therefore says much for Mr. Borwick that it aroused great enthusiasm among the crowded audience. It was certainly a very fine performance, marvellously accurate, full of warm feeling, and characterized by a measure of breadth and dignity of style such as is looked for only from artists of the first rank. It may, perhaps, be premature to class Mr. Borwick among these, but of the numerous pianists who have appealed to the London public this season he must be placed among the foremost. Mr. Arthur Chappell has engaged him for the next season of the Popular Concerts, so that opportunities will be afforded of gauging his ability for the interpretation of the highest class of chamber music. The rest of Monday's programme was of a familiar character. Magnificent performances were given of Beethoven's Symphony in A, No. 7, Wagner's Siegfried Idyll, and the Trauermarsch from 'Götterdämmerung'; but the rendering of Mendelssohn's 'Ruy Blas' Overture showed that Herr Richter is not in sympathy with Mendelssohn's music, the ensemble being utterly spoilt by the blaring of the trumpets and trombones.

Musical Gossip.

THE latest pianist of the season, M. Leopold Godowsky, is also one of the best. A Pole by birth, as his name signifies, M. Godowsky is not yet twenty years old; but in a technical sense he is already a first-rate player, his style resembling that of his teacher M. Saint-Saëns. In other words, his execution is marked by crispness and accuracy, but not by striking contrasts. The programme of his recital at the Steinway Hall on Thursday last week was simple enough, only four composers being represented. Beethoven's Thirty-two Variations in c minor were excellently played; but it was a gross error of judgment to omit the first movement of the Sonata in F minor ('Appassionata') which followed. There was nothing worthy of special note in the rendering of Schumann's 'Etudes Symphoniques' and some numbers of the 'Kreisleriana,' nor of two Chopin pieces. Some trifles from his own pen displayed M. Godowsky in a favourable light as a composer. Musicians will be glad to renew his acquaintance at a more convenient season.

THE programme of Mr. W. G. Cusins's annual concert at St. James's Hall on the same afternoon was of a high-class character. The concert-giver's share in the entertainment was limited to the pianoforte part in his effective Trio in c minor, and pianoforte pieces by Chopin and Thalberg. M. van Waelfelghem aroused much interest by the pieces he played on the semi-obsolete viola d'amore; and Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, Madame Albani, and MM. Johannes Wolff and Hollmann took part in the concert.

In the evening there were several concerts, the most interesting of which was that of Herr Felix Berber at the Princes' Hall. We have had occasion more than once to refer to a new Norwegian composer, Christian Sinding; but, so far as we are aware, this was the first time his name appeared in a London concert programme. His Pianoforte Quintet in E is a striking work, full of Scandinavian character, and very well constructed, the climax being the most effective portion of each movement. The concert-giver, who is a capable violinist, was assisted in the instrumental portion of the programme by Messrs. Sapellnikoff, Kummer, Straus, and Piatti. Madame Schmidt-Koehne, a soprano, made a highly favourable impression, and will be gladly heard again.

THE Royal College orchestral concert on the same evening, under the direction of Mr. H. Holmes, was chiefly noteworthy for a capital performance of Mendelssohn's 'Italian' Symphony by the orchestra of students and professors. Mr. Charles Magrath showed much promise as a genuine bass singer in an aria from Mozart's 'Die Entführung.'

THE concerts of Friday do not call for criticism. On Saturday the most important performance was that on the Crystal Palace Handel orchestra by the Association of Tonic Sol-fa Choirs. The rendering of Sir John Stainer's cantata 'The Daughter of Jairus,' under the composer's direction, and a miscellaneous selection under Mr. W. G. McNaught, showed to what a high degree of excellence choral singing under the Tonic Sol-fa system has now attained. The precision of the large force of over 2,000 voices and the clear enunciation of the words call for warm recognition. The festival included other features, which, however, do not call for notice in this place. Miss Annie Marriott, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Andrew Black were the soloists in the principal performance.

SEÑOR SARASATE's second concert (the first with orchestra this season) was made up of familiar items. The Spanish violinist has an excessive predilection for Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole,' which, however, no other artist could render equally effective. This was his principal solo; the other pieces, by Raff, Liszt, Saint-Saëns, and himself, being of little intrinsic value. The orchestra under Mr. Cusins played Grieg's popular suite 'Peer Gynt,' the third and fourth movements of which were encored, and the Overture to 'Tannhäuser.'

SATURDAY's performances included the second and last of Mlle. Kleeberg's piano recitals at the Princes' Hall, in which the French artist was heard to great advantage in Mendelssohn's Fantasia in F sharp minor, Op. 28, Brahms's Rhapsodie in c minor, and other minor pieces, though she seemed a little overweighted in Beethoven's Sonata in A flat, Op. 110.

THE chamber concert of the Royal Academy of Music on Monday afternoon at St. James's Hall did not serve to reveal any remarkable talent. Among the most promising students were Miss Mignon Spencer and Miss Galbraith (contralto), Miss Ethel Barns (pianist), and Mr.

J. E. Philp (organist). Dr. A. C. Mackenzie conducted.

THERE is as yet no falling off in the number of pianoforte recitals. Madame Carreño gave another performance at St. James's Hall on Tuesday afternoon. Her playing was somewhat unequal, the rendering of Beethoven's Sonata in E flat, Op. 27, No. 1, being flurried and in the last movement indistinct, while that of Chopin's Prelude in D flat and Etude in A flat lacked expression. On the other hand, Schumann's 'Vogel als Prophet' and the Toccata in C, Op. 7, were beautifully played, the former with delicacy of touch, and the latter with sufficient breadth and power.

MADAME HAAS gave a pianoforte recital on Wednesday afternoon at the Steinway Hall, her pure and tasteful style of execution giving effect to Beethoven's Sonata in A flat, Op. 110, and pieces by Bach, Scarlatti, Schumann, and other composers. As an interpreter of Chopin, however, Madame Haas cannot take high rank, her reading of the Fantasia in F minor and other pieces being tame and commonplace.

THE principal items in the programme of the Musical Artists' Society on Wednesday at the Princes' Hall were a well-written and effective Sonata Concertante for four violins with piano accompaniment, by Mr. Charles Fowler; a Trio in C minor, by Mr. W. H. Hadon; and another Trio in the same key, by Mr. Aguilar. Mention should be made of a charming duet, "Sing to me," by Miss R. F. Ellicott, sung by the composer and Mr. Claude Ravenhill.

ATTENTION may be drawn to the Welsh Ladies' Choir concert, which is to take place on Wednesday, July 2nd, at St. James's Hall, for the benefit of the Morfa Colliery Explosion Fund. The principal feature will be a performance of Roeckel's cantata 'Westward Ho!' accompanied by twenty pianists on ten Bechstein pianos.

THE Edinburgh Society of Musicians have memorialized the University Commissioners for Scotland respecting the Reid Chair of Music. They assert that the funds are ample for the foundation of a local school of music, and that the bequest has not hitherto produced the results intended by the donor. Those who have any knowledge of the subject will cordially agree with the memorialists, and it is to be hoped that a means may be found of carrying out their excellent design.

M. ÉMILE DE MLYNARSKI, solo violinist to the Imperial Russian Society, of which the Russian Emperor is protector, has arrived in London, and will appear at the Princes' Hall on July 7th. He has just purchased a genuine Stradivarius violin for one thousand guineas.

MR. ALBERT B. BACH's lecture on the 'Ballad Airs of Loewe and Schubert,' which was delivered before the members of the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution last winter, will shortly be published in an enlarged form by Messrs. Blackwood & Sons. The volume will be entitled 'The Art Ballad: Loewe and Schubert.'

A COMMITTEE has been formed to consider by what means the bicentenary of the birth of Tartini can be suitably observed. The celebrated violinist and composer was born at Pirano, in Istria, on April 12th, 1692.

THE Sängerbund festival in Vienna has been fixed to take place between August 14th and 18th. It is calculated that nearly 900 societies, numbering 12,000 singers, will take part in the performances.

CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK.

- MON. Mr. E. Zeldenzust's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Steinway Hall.
 — Miss Emma Barker's Concert, 3, Colliard & Colliard's Concert Rooms.
 — Madame Thénard's Matinée, 3.15, No. 105, Piccadilly.
 — Richter Concert, 8.30, St. James's Hall.
 — Royal Italian Opera, 'Le Prophète.'
 TUES. Señor Albeniz's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Steinway Hall.
 — M. L. M. Bretter's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Princes' Hall.
 — Madame Sophie Menter and M. Sapelnikoff's Pianoforte Recital, 3, St. James's Hall.
 — Mr. Wilhelm Ganz's Concert, 3, Dudley House.
 — Kensington School of Music Concert, 8, No. 126, Cromwell Road.
 — Mr. Metcalfe's Concert, 8.15, Lyric Club.

- THURS. The Musical Guild, 8.30, Kensington Town Hall.
 — Court is Aid of the Hospital for Nervous Diseases, 8.30, Steinway Hall.
 — Royal Italian Opera.
 — Mr. Schönbeger's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Steinway Hall.
 — Mr. Irving and Miss Ellen Terry's 'Macbeth' Recital, with Sullivan's Music, 3, St. James's Hall.
 — Miss Carlotta Elliot's Concert, 3.30, Dudley House.
 — National Orthopedic Hospital Concert, 8, St. James's Hall.
 — Herr Ernst Denhof's Pianoforte Recital, 8, Princes' Hall.
 — Royal Italian Opera.
 FRID. Mr. Stan'ey Smith's Concert, 3, Steinway Hall.
 THURS. Miss Victoria de Busen's Annual Concert, 3, Portman Rooms.
 — Signor M. A. Franceschetti's Historical Concert, 3, No. 105, Piccadilly.
 — Mr. Harry Williams's Concert, 8, Steinway Hall.
 — Royal College of Music Students' Concert, 9, Alexandra House.
 — Madame Cellini's Concert, 9, St. James's Hall.
 — Royal Italian Opera, 'Le Prophète.'
 FRID. Madame Vernon's Concert, 3, Steinway Hall.
 — Miss Zoe Caryll's Concert, 3, St. James's Hall.
 — Madame Amy Sherwin's Concert, 3, Princes' Hall.
 — Miss Georgian Ganz's Matinée Musicale, 3, No. 4, Grosvenor Place.
 — Mr. Edwin Holland's Concert, 3, Portman Rooms.
 — Concert in Aid of London Municipal Band Fund, 8, St. James's Hall.
 — Royal Italian Opera.
 SAT. Philharmonic Concert, 3, St. James's Hall.
 — Fatti Concert, 3, Albert Hall.
 — Mr. Avon Saxon's Concert, 3, St. James's (Banqueting) Hall.

DRAMA

THE WEEK.

GLOBE.—'Romeo and Juliet.'

NOT easy to understand are the conditions of the modern stage. While as regards serious managerial ventures the traditions of the past are dismissed, they are still of authority in the ill-starred experiments of self-constituted actors seeking a royal road to the stage. A century, more or less, ago the more popular plays of Shakespeare were stock pieces at the patent houses, and when a manager had quarrelled with his leading actor or actress, or was afraid of a demand for higher terms, it was in Hamlet or Richard III. on the one hand, or Juliet on the other, that it was attempted to set up a rival. Now, except under conditions rarely realized, 'Romeo and Juliet' is not likely to commend itself to a manager. Yet the novice chooses it for her début, as though she were challenging a host of comparisons, and as though managers, so soon as they saw her, were bound to rush at her with offers of engagement. Not wholly a novice is Miss Adelaide Moore, who, at the Globe Theatre, seeks to win back the public to their old faith. She has already been seen in London, and she has since that time followed her profession in England and in America. Nature, however, though she has been kind to Miss Moore as regards physical gifts, endowing her with a good figure and an expressive face, has joined to these an intractable voice and a defect in speech which the actress is not able to surmount. In a comedy of modern life or in a melodrama this might not prove wholly a disqualification. It is otherwise, however, in Juliet. Thus, though the general representation displayed a certain measure of intelligence, and some points we do not previously recall were introduced, and though the mise en scène was effective, the revival will scarcely prove a success. Among the restorations which are judiciously made are the kisses bestowed in Act I. sc. v. by Romeo upon the lips of Juliet, which modern squeamishness has constantly excised. The directions "Kissing her" and "Kissing her again" appear only in the later editions and are not found in the first folio, but the meaning of the text is plain. While, moreover, nothing could be less Italian than the taking by a stranger of such a liberty, it was wholly consonant with English custom, which Shakespeare in almost every case copied. Erasmus's praise of this custom on the part of English ladies is well known, and its influence survived sufficiently long to make Shakespeare see in it nothing extraordinary. The Romeo of Mr. Otis Skinner, formerly a member of the Augustin Daly Company, is subdued and effective. Almost alone among Romeos he speaks to Juliet in her father's house as one aware of the consequences of discovery, and not wantonly challenging detection. His anger at the death of Mercutio is virile, but should scarcely lead him, after the first wound has been given, to pass his sword thrice through the unresisting body of Tybalt. Mr. Mark Quinton is Mercutio, and Mrs. Charles Calvert the Nurse.

Dramatic Gossip.

'A PEOPLE'S HERO,' a four-act play by Mr. W. Howell-Poole, founded upon Ouida's novel of 'Tricorin,' and given at the Vaudeville at an afternoon performance, is a moderately interesting melodrama, in which some actors, the author included, comparatively unknown in London, played with fair ability. A congregation of oddities such as was supposed to be gathered together in the fashionable streets of Paris, however, casts ridicule upon the whole entertainment. The heroine had only a Red Riding Hood cloak over her head, a second character was in a dirty and extravagant Greek costume, and another gentleman, presumably of Italian origin, was even more eccentrically clad, and was décolleté to an extent that is happily rare in the case of either sex. Miss Alice Raynor and Miss Laura Hansen played the principal female characters.

THE inability of Madame Bernhardt to appear on the day fixed has caused some disappointment, and has brought about a temporary cessation of performances at Her Majesty's. On Monday next she will, it is hoped, be well enough to be seen in 'Jeanne d'Arc.'

THE run of 'Theodora' at the Princess's ends to-night. It is not often that so many West-End houses close so early in the season.

THE North London branch of the English Goethe Society seems to be doing a useful service. Under the direction of Mrs. Coupland, the wife of the gentleman who has been chiefly instrumental in founding the Society, a series of Goethe's plays are being performed by amateur actors. Admirers of the poet have thus an opportunity of seeing a representation of two of his plays which, though little known even to the German public, are highly characteristic and interesting, viz., 'Der Bürger-general' and the Singspiel 'Claudine von Villa Bella.' The performances will take place at the Royal Park Lecture Hall, Park Street, N.W.

AT a conversazione to be given by Mr. Charles Holme, the President of the Sette di Odd Volumes, at the Grosvenor Gallery on Thursday, July 17th, a short play by Dr. Todhunter will be produced, entitled 'How Dreams Come True,' in which a romantic episode in the life of an early German typographer forms the main incident.

NEXT WEEK'S NOVELTIES AND REVIVALS.

- MON. Her Majesty's (Evening), 'Jeanne d'Arc,' postponed from last Monday.
 TUES. Lyceum (Evening), 'Nancy & Co.'
 THURS. St. James's (Evening), Reopening: 'Old Friends,' by Lady Violet Greville, and 'Your Wife,' by Justin Huesty McCarthy.
 (The above announcements are subject to changes of plan on the part of managers.)

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—J. W.—H. J. D.—J. S.—J. A.—C. R. L.—received.
 W. B. B.—Forwarded.
 No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION BY POST.

	s.	d.
For Twelve Months	15	3
For Six Months	7	8

SATURDAY, JUNE 28, 1890.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI	825
CELTIC TRADITION	826
THE ROMANOFFS	826
MUNGO PARK AND THE NIGER	827
NOVELS OF THE WEEK	828
THEOLOGICAL BOOKS	828
OUR LIBRARY TABLE—LIST OF NEW BOOKS	829-830
'AN INTERESTING EVENT,' BY M. A. TITMARS; MR. EDWARD COLBORNE BABER; WASHINGTON'S ANCESTRY; THEORIES ABOUT JUNIUS; SALE; THE RIGHT OF QUOTATION; AMERICAN COPYRIGHT 831-833
LITERARY GOSSIP	834
SCIENCE—RECENT PUBLICATIONS; SIR W. W. SMYTH, F.R.S.; THE MARINE BIOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION; THE MUSEUMS' ASSOCIATION; SOCIETIES; MEETINGS; GOSSIP	835-837
FINE ARTS—THE NEW SALON; SALES; GOSSIP	838-839
MUSIC—THE WEEK; GOSSIP; CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK	840-841
DRAMA—THE WEEK; THE GREEK PLAY AT BRADFORD COLLEGE; MR. IRVING'S RECITAL OF 'MACBETH'; GOSSIP; NEXT WEEK'S NOVELTIES	841-842

LITERATURE

Dante Gabriel Rossetti as Designer and Writer.
Notes by William Michael Rossetti.
(Cassell & Co.)

In his preface Mr. W. M. Rossetti says:—

"I have not attempted to write a biographical account of my brother, nor to estimate the range or value of his powers and performances in fine art and in literature. I agree with those who think that a brother is not the proper person to undertake work of this sort. An outsider can do it dispassionately, though with imperfect knowledge of the facts; a friend can do it with mastery, and without much undue bias; but a brother, however equitably he may address himself to the task, cannot perform it so as to secure the prompt and cordial assent of his readers."

These words will serve as a good example of the dignified modesty which is a characteristic of Mr. W. M. Rossetti's, and is one of the best features of this volume. In these days of empty pretence it is always refreshing to come upon a page written in the spirit of scholarly self-suppression which informs every line this patient and admirable critic writes. And as to the interesting question glanced at in the passage above quoted, though the contents of this volume will, no doubt, form valuable material for the future biography of Rossetti, we wonder whether the time is even yet at hand when that biography, whether written by brother, by friend, or by outsider, is needed. That mysterious entity "the public" would, no doubt, like to get one; but we have always shared Rossetti's own opinion that a man of genius is no more the property of the "public" than is any private gentleman; and we have always felt with him that the prevalence in our time of the opposite opinion has fashioned so intolerable a yoke for the neck of any one who has had the misfortune to pass from the sweet paradise of obscurity into the vulgar purgatory of Fame, that it almost behoves a man of genius to avoid, if he can, passing into that purgatory at all. Can any biography, by whomsoever written, be other than inchoate and illusory—nay, can it fail to be fraught with danger to the memory of the dead, with danger to the peace of the living, until years have fully calmed the air around the dead man's grave? So long as the man to be portrayed cannot be separated from his surroundings, so long as his portrait cannot be fully and honestly limned without peril to the peace of those among whom he moved—in a word, so long as there remains any throb of vitality in those delicate filaments of social life by which he was enlinked to those with whom he played his part—that brother, or that friend, or that outsider who shall attempt the portraiture must feel what heavy responsibilities are his—must not forget that with him to trip is to sin against the dead. And how shall he decide when the time has at last come for making the attempt? Before the incidents of a man's life can be exploited without any risk of mischief, how much time should elapse? "A month," say the publishers, each one of whom runs his own special "biographical series," and keeps his own special bevy of recording angels writing against time and against each other. "Thirty years," said one whose life-wisdom was so perfect as to be in a world like ours almost an adequate substitute for the morality he lacked—Talleyrand.

Of all forms of literary art biography demands from the artist not only the greatest courage, but also the happiest combination of the highest gifts. To succeed in painting the portrait of Achilles or of Priam, of Hamlet or of Othello, may be difficult, but it is as difficult as to succeed in painting the portrait of Browning or Rossetti? Surely not. In the one case an intense dramatic imagination is needed, and nothing more. If Homer's Achaian and Trojan heroes were falsely limned, not they, but Homer's art, would suffer the injury. If for the purposes of art the poet unduly exalted this one or unduly abased that—if he misread one incident in the mythical life of Achilles, and another in the mythical life of Hector—he did wrong to his art undoubtedly, but none to the memory of a dead man, and none to the peace of a living one. But with him who would paint the portrait of Browning or Rossetti how different is the case! Although he requires the poet's vision before he can paint a living picture of his subject, the task he has set himself to do is something more than artistic: before everything else it is fiduciary. A trustee whose trust fund is biographical truth, he has, after collecting and marshalling all the facts that come to his hand, to decide what is truth as indicated by those generalized facts. But having done this, he has to decide what is the proper time for giving the world the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth—what is the proper time? In the biographer's relation to the dead man on the one hand and to the public on the other should he be so unhappy as to forget that time is of the very "essence of the contract"—should he forget that so inwoven is human life that truth spoken at the wrong moment may be a greater mischief-worker than error—he may, if conscientious, have to remember that forgetfulness of his during the remainder of his days. He who thinks that truth may not be sometimes as mischievous as a pestilence knows but little of this mysterious and wonderful net of human life. But if this is so with regard to truth, how much more is it so with regard to mere matter of fact? Fact-worship, document-worship, is at once the crowning folly and the crowning vice of our time. To mistake a fact for a truth, and to give the world that; to throw facts about and documents about heedless of the mischief they may work—wronging the dead and wronging the living—this is actually paraded as a virtue in these days.

Here is a case in point. Down to the very last moment of his life Rossetti's feeling towards his great contemporary Lord Tennyson was that of the deepest admiration, and yet what says the documentary evidence as given to the world by Rossetti's brother? It shows that Rossetti used an extremely unpleasant phrase concerning a letter from Tennyson acknowledging the receipt of Rossetti's first volume of poems in 1870. Those who have heard Lord Tennyson speak of Rossetti know that to use this phrase in relation to any letter of his dealing with Rossetti's poetry was to misunderstand it. Yet here are the unpleasant words of a hasty mood, "rather shabby," in print. And why? Because the public has become so demoralized that its feast of facts, its feast of documents it must have, come what will. But even supposing that the public had any rights whatsoever in regard to a man of genius, which we deny, what are letters as indications of a man's character? Of all modes of expression is not the epistolary mode that in which man's instinct for using language "to disguise his thoughts" is most likely to exercise itself? There is likely to be far more deep sincerity in a sonnet than in a letter. It is no exaggeration to say that the common courtesies of life demand a certain amount of what is called "blarney" in a letter—especially in an eminent man's letter—which would ruin a sonnet. And this must be steadily borne in mind at a time like ours, when private letters are bought and sold like any other article of merchandise, not only immediately after a man's death, but during his lifetime. With regard to literary men, their letters in former times were simply artistic compositions; hence as indications of character they must be judged by the same canons as literary essays would be judged. In both cases the writer had full space and full time to qualify his statements of opinion; in both cases he was without excuse for throwing out anything heedlessly. Not only in Walpole's case and Gray's, but also in Charles Lamb's, we apply the same rules of criticism to the letters as we apply to the published utterances that appeared in the writer's lifetime. But now, when letters are just the hurried expression of the moment, when ill-considered things—often rash things—are said which either in literary compositions or in conversation would have been, if said at all, greatly qualified—the greatest injustice that can be done to a writer is to print his letters indiscriminately. Especially is this the case with Rossetti. All who knew him speak of him as being a superb critic, and a superb critic he was. But his printed letters show nothing of the kind. On literary subjects they are often full of over-statement and of biased judgment. Here is the explanation: in conversation he had a way of perpetrating a brilliant critical paradox for the very purpose of qualifying it, turning it about, colouring it by the lights of his wonderful fancy, until at last it became something quite different from the original paradox, and full of truth and wisdom. But when such a paradox went off in a letter, there it remained unqualified; and they who, not having known him, scoff at his friends who claim for him the honours of a great critic, seem to scoff with reason.

No one was more conscious of the treachery of letters than was Rossetti himself. Comparatively late in his life he realized what all eminent men would do well to realize, that owing to the degradation of public taste, which cries out for more personal gossip and still more every day, the time has fully come when every man of mark must consider the rights of his friends—when it behoves every man who has had the misfortune to pass into fame to burn all letters; and he began the holocaust that duty to friendship demanded of him. But the work of reading through such a correspondence as his in order to see what letters must be preserved from the burning took more time and more patience than he had contemplated, and the destruction did not progress further than to include the letters of the early sixties. Business letters it was, of course, necessary to preserve, and very properly it is from these that Mr. W. M. Rossetti has mainly quoted.

The volume is divided into two parts: first, documents relating to the production of certain of Rossetti's pictures and poems; and second, a prose paraphrase of 'The House of Life.'

The documents consist of abstracts of and extracts from such portions of Rossetti's correspondence as have fallen into his brother's hands as executor. Dealing as they necessarily do with these complications of prices and those involved commissions for which Rossetti's artistic career was remarkable, there is a commercial air about the first portion of the book which some will think out of harmony with their conception of the painter, about whom there used to be such a mysterious interest until much writing about him had brought him into the light of common day. In future years a summary so accurate and so judicious as this will seem better worth making than it, perhaps, seems at the present moment; for Mr. W. M. Rossetti's love of facts is accompanied by an equally strong love of making an honest statement of facts—a tabulated statement, if possible; and no one writing of Rossetti need hesitate about following his brother to the last letter and to the last figure. To be precise and perspicuous is, he hints in his preface, better than to be graphic and entertaining; and we entirely agree with him, especially when the subject discussed is Rossetti, about whom so many fancies that are neither precise nor perspicuous are current. Still, to read about this picture being offered to one buyer and that to another, and rejected or accepted at a greatly reduced price after much chaffering, is not, we will confess, exhilarating reading to those to whom Rossetti's pictures are also poems. It does not conduce to the happiness of his admirers to think of such works being produced under such prosaic conditions. One buyer—a most worthy man, to be sure, and a true friend of Rossetti's, but full of that British superstition about the saving grace of clothes which is so wonderful a revelation to the pensive foreigner—had to be humoured in his craze against the nude. After having painted a beautiful partly-draped Gretchen (which, we may remark in passing, had no relation, as Mr. W. M. Rossetti supposes, to the Marguerite alluded to in a letter to Mr. Graham in 1870) from a new model whose characteristics were a superb bosom and arms, he, Rossetti, was obliged to consent to conceal the best portions of the picture under drapery. That this was a matter of great and peculiar vexation to him may be supposed when it is remembered that unequalled as had been his good fortune in finding fine face-models (ladies of position and culture, and often of extraordinary beauty), he had in the matter of figure-models been most unlucky. And this, added to his slight knowledge of anatomy, made all his nude pictures undesirable save those few painted from the beautiful girl who stood for 'The Spirit of the Rainbow' and 'Forced Music.' What his work from the nude suffered from this is incalculable, as may be seen in the crayon called 'Ligeia Siren,' a naked siren playing on a kind of lute, which Rossetti described as "certainly one of his best things." The beauty and value of a crayon which for weird poetry—especially in the eyes—must be among Rossetti's masterpieces are ruined by the drawing of the breasts.

The most interesting feature of the book, however, is not that which deals with the prices Rossetti got for his pictures, but that which tells the reader the place where and the conditions under which they were painted; and no portion of the book is more interesting than that which relates to the work done at Kelmscott:—

"At the beginning of this year 1874 Rossetti was again occupied with the picture which he had commenced in the preceding spring, entitled, 'The Bower Maiden'—a girl in a room with a pot of marigolds and a black cat. It was painted from 'little Annie' (a cottage-girl and house assistant at Kelmscott), and it 'goes on' (to quote the words of one of his letters) 'like a house on fire. This is the only kind of picture one ought to do—just copying the materials, and no more: all others are too much trouble.' It is not difficult to understand that the painter of a 'Proserpine' and a 'Ghirlandata' would occasionally feel the luxury of a mood intellectually lazy, and would be minded to give voice to it—as in this instance—in terms wilfully extreme; keeping his mental eye none the less steadily directed to a 'Roman Widow' or a 'Blessed Damsel' in the near future. As a matter of fact, my brother painted very few things, at any stage of his career, as mere representations of reality, unimbuied by some inventive or ideal meaning: in the rare instances when he did so, he naturally felt an indolent comfort, and made no scruple of putting the feeling into words—highly suitable for being taken cum grano salis. Nothing was more alien from his nature or habit than 'tall talk' of any kind about his aims, aspirations, or performances. It was into his work—not into his utterances about his work—that he infused the higher and deeper elements of his spirit. 'The Bower Maiden' was finished early in February, and sold to Mr. Graham for 682*l.*, after it had been offered to Mr. Leyland at a rather higher figure, and declined. It has also passed under the names of 'Fleurs de Marie,' 'Marigolds,' and 'The Gardener's Daughter.' After 'The Bower Maiden' had been disposed of, other work was taken up—more especially 'The Roman Widow,' bearing the alternative title of 'Dis Manibus,' which was in an advanced stage by the month of May, and was completed in June or July. It was finished with little or no glazing. The Roman widow is a lady still youthful, in a grey fawn-tinted drapery, with a musical instrument in each hand; she is in the sepulchral chamber of her husband, whose stone urn appears in the background. I possess the antique urn which my brother procured, and which he used for the painting. For graceful simplicity, and for depth of earnest but not strained sentiment, he never, I think, exceeded 'The Roman Widow.' The two instruments seem to repeat the two mottoes on the urn, 'Ave Domine—Vale Domine.' The head was painted from Miss Wilding, already mentioned; but it seems to me partly associated with the type of Mrs. Stillman's face as well. There are many roses in this picture—both wild and garden roses; they kept the artist waiting a little after the work was otherwise finished. 'I really think it looks well,' he wrote on one occasion; 'its fair luminous colour seems to melt into the gold frame (which has only just come) like a part of it.' He feared that the picture might be 'too severe and tragic' for some tastes; but could add (not, perhaps, with undue confidence), 'I don't think Géricault or Régnault would have quite scorned it.'

The magnificent design here alluded to, 'Dis Manibus,' entirely suggested by the urn, which had somewhat come into his possession (probably through Howell), and also 'The Bower Maiden,' suggested by his accidentally seeing a pretty cottage-child lifting some marigolds to a shelf, formed part of the superb work produced by Rossetti during his long retirement at Kelmscott Manor—that period never before recorded, which has at this very moment been brought into prominence by his friend Dr. Hake's sonnet-sequence 'The New Day,' just published. As far as literary and artistic work goes, it was, perhaps, the richest period of his life; and that it was also one of the happiest is clear not only from his own words, but also from the following testimony of Dr. Hake, who saw much of him there:—

O, happy days with him who once so loved us!
We loved as brothers, with a single heart,
The man whose iris-woven pictures moved us
From Nature to her blazoned shadow—Art.
How often did we trace the nestling Thames
From humblest waters on his course of might,
Down where the weir the bursting current stems—
There sat till evening grew to balmy night,
Veiling the weir whose roar recalled the strand
Where we had listened to the wave-lipped sea,
That seemed to utter plaudits while we planned
Triumphal labours of the day to be.

It was at Kelmscott, in the famous tapestried room, that besides painting the 'Proserpine,' 'The Roman Widow,' &c., he wrote many of his later poems, including 'Rose Mary.'

Considering how deep is Mr. W. M. Rossetti's affection for his brother's memory, and how great is his admiration for his brother's work, it is remarkable how judicious is his mind when writing about him. This is what he says about the much discussed 'Venus Astarte':—

"Into the 'Venus Astarte' he had put his utmost intensity of thinking, feeling, and method—he had aimed to make it equally strong in abstract sentiment and in physical grandeur—an ideal of the mystery of beauty, offering a sort of combined quintessence of what he had endeavoured in earlier years to embody in the two several types of 'Sibylla Palmifera' and 'Lilith,' or (as he ultimately named them in the respective sonnets) 'Soul's Beauty' and 'Body's Beauty.' It may be well to remark that, by the time when he completed the 'Venus Astarte,' or 'Astarte Syriaca,' he had got into a more austere feeling than of old with regard to colour and chiaroscuro; and the charm of the picture has, I am aware, been less, to many critics and spectators of the work, than he would have deemed to be its due, as compared with some of his other performances of more obvious and ostensible attraction."

Though Mr. W. M. Rossetti is right in saying that it was not till the beginning of 1877 that this remarkable picture was brought to a conclusion, the main portions were done during that long sojourn at Bognor in 1876-7, which those who have written about Rossetti have hitherto left unrecorded. Having fallen into ill health after his return to London from Kelmscott, he was advised to go to the seaside, and a large house at Bognor was finally selected. No doubt one reason why the preference was given to Bognor was the fact that Blake's cottage at Felpham was close by, for business-like and unbusiness-like qualities were strangely mingled in Rossetti's temperament, and it was generally some sentiment or unpractical fancy of this kind that brought about Rossetti's final decision upon anything. Blake's name was with him still a word to charm with, and he was surprised to find, on the first pilgrimage of himself and his friends to the cottage, that scarcely a person in the neighbourhood knew what Blake it was that "the Londoners" were inquiring about. To the secluded house at Bognor—a house so surrounded by trees and shrubs that the murmur of the waves mingling with the whispers of the leaves seemed at one moment the sea's voice, and at another the voice of the earth—Rossetti took not only the cartoon of the 'Astarte Syriaca,' but also the most peculiar of all his pictures, 'The Blessed Damozel,' which had long lain in an incomplete state. But it was not much painting that he did at Bognor. From a cause he tried in vain to understand, and tried in vain to conquer, his thoughts ran upon poetry, and refused to fix themselves upon art. Partly this might have been owing to the fact that now, comparatively late in life, he to whom, as his brother well says, "such words as sea, ship, and boat were generic terms admitting of little specific and still less of any individual and detailed distinction," awoke to the fascination that the sea sooner or later exercises upon all truly romantic souls. For deep as is the poetry of the inland woods, the Spirit of Romance, if there at all, is there in hiding. In order for that Spirit to come forth and take captive the soul something else is wanted; howsoever thick and green the trees—howsoever bright and winding the streams—a magical glimmer of sea-light far or near must shine through the branches as they wave. That this should be a new experience to so fine a poet as Rossetti was no doubt strange, but so it chanced to be. He whose talk at Kelmscott had been of 'Blessed Damozels' and 'Roman Widows,' and the like, talked now of the wanderings of Ulysses, of 'The Ancient Mariner,' of 'Sir Patrick Spens,' and even of 'Arthur Gordon Pym' and 'Allan Gordon.' And on hearing a friend recite some tentative verses on a great naval battle, he looked about for sea subjects too; and it was now, and not later, as is generally supposed, that he really thought of the subject of 'The White Ship,' a subject apparently so alien from his genius. Every evening he used to take walks on the beach for miles and miles, delighted with a beauty that before had had no charms for him. Still, the 'Astarte Syriaca' did progress, though slowly, and became the masterpiece that Mr. W. M. Rossetti sets so high among his brother's work.

"From Bognor my brother returned to his house in Cheyne Walk; and in the summer he paid a visit to two of his kindest and most considerate friends, Lord and Lady Mount-Temple, at their seat of Broadlands in Hampshire. He executed there a portrait in chalks of Lady Mount-Temple. He went on also with the picture of 'The Blessed Damozel.' For the head of an infant angel which appears in the front of this picture he made drawings from two children—one being the baby of the Rev. H. C. Hawtrej, and the other a workhouse infant. The former sketch was presented to the parents of the child and the latter to Lady Mount-Temple; and the head with its wings, was painted on to the canvas at Broadlands."

Mr. W. M. Rossetti omits to mention that the landscape which forms the predella to 'The Blessed Damozel,' a river winding in a peculiarly tortuous course through the cedars and other wide-spread trees of an English park, was taken from the scenery of Broadlands—that fairyland of soft beauty which lived in his memory as it must needs live in the memory of every one who has once known it. But the wonder is that such a mass of solid material has been compressed into so small a space.

Mr. W. M. Rossetti's paraphrase of 'The House of Life'—done with so much admiration of his brother's genius and affection for his memory—touches upon a question relating to poetic art which has been before raised in these columns—raised in connexion with prose renderings of Homer, Sophocles, and Dante: Are poetry and prose so closely related in method that one can ever be adequately turned into the other? Schiller no doubt wrote his dramas in prose and then turned them into rhetorical verse; but then there are those who affirm that Schiller's rhetorical verse is scarcely poetry. The importance of the question will be seen when we call to mind that if such a transmutation of form were possible, translations of poetry would be possible; for though, owing to the tyrannous demands of form, the verse of one language can never be translated into the verse of another, it can always be rendered in the prose of another, only it then ceases to be poetry. That the intellectual, and even to some extent the emotional, substance of a poem can be seized and covered by a prose translation is seen in Prof. Jebb's rendering of the 'Edipus Rex'; but, as we have before remarked, the fundamental difference between imaginative prose and poetry is that, while the one must be informed with intellectual life and emotional life, the other has to be informed with both these kinds of life, and with another life beyond these—rhythmic life. Now, if we wished to show that rhythmic life is in poetry the most important of all, our example would, we think, be Mr. W. M. Rossetti's prose paraphrase of his brother's sonnets. The obstacles against the adequate turning of poetry into prose can be best understood by considering the obstacles against the adequate turning of prose into poetry. Prose notes tracing out the course of the future poem may, no doubt, be made, and usefully made, by the poet (as Wordsworth said in an admirable letter to Gillies), unless, indeed, the notes form too elaborate an attempt at a full prose expression of the subject-matter, in which case, so soon as the poet tries to rise on his winged words, his wingless words are likely to act as a dead weight. For this reason, when Wordsworth said that the prose notes should be brief, he might almost as well have gone on to say that in expression they should be slovenly. This at least may be said, that the moment the language of the prose note is so "adequate" and rich that it seems to be what Wordsworth would call the natural "incarnation of the thought," the poet's imagination, if it escapes at all from the chains of the prose expression, escapes with great difficulty. An instance of this occurred in Rossetti's own experience.

During one of those seaside rambles alluded to above, while he was watching with some friends the billows tumbling in beneath the wintry moon, some one, perhaps Rossetti himself, directed attention to the peculiar effect of the moon's disc reflected in the white surf, and compared it to fire in snow. Rossetti, struck with the picturesqueness of the comparison, made there and then an elaborate prose note of it in one of the diminutive pocket-books that he was in the habit of carrying in the capacious pocket of his waistcoat. Years afterwards—shortly before his death, in fact—when he came to write 'The King's Tragedy,' remembering this note, he thought he could find an excellent place for it in the scene where the king meets the Spæ wife on the seashore and listens to her prophecies of doom. But he was at once confronted by this obstacle: so elaborately had the image of the moon reflected in the surf been rendered in the prose note—so entirely did the prose matter seem to be the inevitable and the final incarnation of the thought—that it appeared impossible to escape from it into the movement and the diction proper to poetry. It was only after much labour—a labour greater than he had given to all the previous stanzas combined—that he succeeded in freeing himself from the fetters of the prose, and in painting the picture in these words:—

That eve was clenched for a boding storm,
Neath a toilsome moon half seen;
The cloud stooped low and the surf rose high;
And where there was a line of sky,
Wild wings loomed dark between.

'Twas then the moon sailed clear of the rack
On high on her hollow dome;
And still as aloft with hoary crest
Each clamorous wave rang home,
Like fire in snow the moonlight blazed
Amid the champing foam.

And the remark was then made to him with regard to Coleridge's 'Wanderings of Cain,' that it is not unlikely the matchless fragment given in Coleridge's poems might have passed nearer towards completion, or at least towards the completion of the first part, had it not been for those elaborate and beautiful prose notes which he has left behind.

And if the attempt to turn prose into poetry is hopeless, the attempt to turn poetry into prose is no less so, and for a like reason—that of the immense difficulty of passing from the movement natural to one mood into the movement natural to another. And this criticism applies especially to the poetry of Rossetti, which produces so many of its best effects by means not of logical statement, but of the music and suggestive richness of rhythmical language. That Rossetti did on some occasions, when told that his sonnets were unintelligible, talk about making such a paraphrase himself is indisputable, because Mr. Fairfax Murray says that he heard him say so. But indisputable also is many another saying of Rossetti's, equally ill-considered and equally impracticable. That he ever seriously thought of doing so is most unlikely.

Waifs and Strays of Celtic Tradition.—Argyllshire Series, No. II.: Folk and Hero Tales. Collected, edited, and translated by the Rev. D. Mac Innes. With Notes by the Editor and Alfred Nutt, Portrait of J. F. Campbell of Islay, and two Illustrations by E. Griset. (Nutt.)

THE present series is appropriately called the "Waifs and Strays of Celtic Tradition," as in fact it could scarcely be otherwise after a man like Campbell of Islay had done his great work of collecting the popular tales of the West Highlands. Nevertheless the present collection, thanks to the industry of Mr. Mac Innes and the encouragement of Lord Archibald Campbell, has an interest of its own. Some of the stories contain things which we do not recollect meeting with elsewhere, and they are a very welcome addition to our previous store of Gaelic folk-tales. This volume has another feature, namely, that it gives, besides the English translation, the whole Gaelic text of each story, and generally speaking the style, as might be expected, is extremely simple; so we can recommend its use not only to those who wish to read the tales, but to students desirous of beginning the study of Scotch Gaelic. We notice some curious loan words in the text, such, for example, as "bonnie fellow" (in Scotch fallow) made into boinn-fala, and applied to a woman.

One of the principal features of the book still remains to be mentioned, namely, that it contains about a hundred pages of notes, mostly by Mr. Alfred Nutt in his best and most approved style. Prefacing his notes with a valuable list of references, he plunges in medias res with a discussion of the development of the Fenian or Ossianic Saga. This he deals with from the point of view of a folk-lorist, so we miss all special references in it to Macpherson, and very rightly so, as the controversy respecting him and his doings has long since been, as a German would say, erledigt, so far as concerns the student, though it may still afford amusement to a certain class of men of letters. Mr. Nutt examines first the view taken by Dr. Skene as to Finn and his merry men, and afterwards that of Mr. Mac Ritchie. He finds that, in so far as the theories of Skene and Mr. Mac Ritchie are based upon semi-literary poems of the twelfth and following centuries, they lack all solid basis, and that the history and geography supposed to be included in them are of the twelfth and not of the third or fourth century. He adds that the history and the geography in question have assumed the form in which we find them in virtue of a mistake; but we prefer letting Mr. Nutt speak for himself:—

"It is because the poet identified the Lochlannach with the Norseman that he gave the remodelled saga the historic setting he did. But I am firmly convinced that this twelfth century identification is as baseless as the tenth century fables of the Trojan origin of the Britons, that Prof. Rhys's brilliant conjecture is right, and that 'Lochlann, like the Welsh Llychlyn, before it came to mean the home of the Norseman, denoted a mysterious country in the lochs and seas.' The opponents of Finn and his peers were, originally, no overseas warriors, but Underworld deities, and the strife between the two is a variant of that between the Tuatha Dé Danann and the Fomorians, they, also, powers of the sea, who were euhemerised by ninth century Irish science into pirates, just as Manannán Mac Lir, the Irish Neptune, was euhemerised into a wealthy ship-owner, living in the Isle of Man."

The question of the origin of the Picts is introduced, as Mr. Mac Ritchie identifies Finn's men, called the Fiann or Feinne, with the fairies; but the value of Mr. Mac Ritchie's reasoning may be estimated from his etymologically connecting the word Feinne with the name of the *Finn*s as denoting the Baltic Ugrians to whom we give that name, and his similarly connecting the Gaelic sidhe, "fairies," with the name of the Tshuds of Northern Europe and Asia. Had Mr. Mac Ritchie entered a chemist's laboratory and proceeded to deal equally freely with things there, he would doubtless have come off minus a limb or an eye; but as it is only with the things of history and language that he plays, no bodily harm happens to him, and his views have even to be respected. It makes all the difference in the world which science it is that you meddle with; for liberties taken with one bring speedy vengeance, while taken with another they result in nothing more serious than unmerited fame. Mr. Nutt sums up his views respecting the Picts as follows:—

"Now, historically, we know but little of the Picts; substantially only three facts: (1) the Picts had a custom of succession through females, which was dying out when it comes before us in history; this would make for their being non-Aryans—(2) the Fortrenn king-name list is partly non-Aryan, partly Celtic, the Celtic portion being Brythonic rather than Gaelic; but then we know that Fortrenn was at least as much Brythonic as Pictish—(3) In the eleventh and twelfth centuries the populations of the larger Pictland are found speaking Gaelic, and have to a great extent continued so to the present day; but then the same fact obtains in the case of populations whom we know to have been Brythonic in race and speech at an earlier period."

Mr. Nutt goes on to say that the probabilities are that the Picts were an early stream of Celtic immigration, and that they had absorbed a number of non-Celtic peoples as well as adopted some of their customs. As to the kind of Celts to be postulated, Mr. Nutt thinks it more likely that the Picts were akin racially to the Gael than to the Brython, and in this he approaches the view taken by Skene. He must, however, be aware that Dr. Macbain, of Inverness, endeavours to prove that the Picts were Brythons or some kind of Welshmen, and that the mayor and corporation of that northern capital are lying in wait for any one who talks freely of a non-Celtic element in the body Pictish; for non-Celtic in such a context smacks of non-Aryan, and that is a heresy not to be tolerated. Such is the extent to which the Aryan has been undeservedly extolled, that "Aryan or nothing" is rapidly becoming the motto of a certain species of crazy patriotism; but the better course would be to set up a cry for Home Rule for the Picts as the most ancient inhabitants of the British Isles.

This digression leaves us no space to describe the notes in detail; suffice it to say that they are as brief and comprehensive as was found compatible with adequate reference to other stories. We wish only to suggest one or two trifling additions. In the story of Lod, where the hero of that name decapitates a three-headed giant who comes to take away the king's daughter, we would compare the story of Cúchullainn rescuing the daughter of the Red King of the Isles. She was to be taken away, however, not by one three-headed famhair, but three fomor, who were to come from their far-away islands to fetch her (see Rhys's 'Hibbert Lectures,' p. 464). It is worth noticing that the singular of the word fomor, "Fomorians," is the word which we have in these Argyllshire stories as famhair, used in the sense of giant generally, though the original meant literally submarine.

Lastly, the giant of mighty breath in the story of Koisha Kayn is to be compared with the Mighty Breather in the story of the banishment of the sons of Dóel Dermait published by Stokes and Windisch in the second series of their 'Irish Texts.' The passage in point in the story of Koisha Kayn runs as follows:—

"I took my brother's advice, and prepared a ship to set off with. I set off alone and embraced the ocean. I was overtaken by a great mist, and I came upon an island, and there was a large number of ships at anchor near it; and I went in amongst them, and went ashore. I saw there a big, big woman reaping rushes; and when she would raise her head she would throw her right breast over her shoulder, and when she would bend it would fall down between her legs. I came once behind her, and caught the nipple of the breast with my mouth, and said to her, 'You are yourself witness, woman, that I am the foster-son of your right breast.' 'I perceive that, great hero,' said the old woman; 'but my advice to you is to leave this island as fast as you can.' 'Why?' said I. 'There is a big giant in the cave up there,' said she, 'and every one of the ships that you see he has taken in from the ocean with his breath, and he has killed and eaten the men. He is asleep at present, and when he wakens he will have you in a similar manner.'"

The story of Dóel Dermait's Sons speaks also of a woman reaping rushes; but it has nothing to match the quaint allusion to fosterage in this story of Koisha Kayn, which will serve as a sample of the naïveté to be now and then met with in these Argyllshire remnants of Celtic tradition.

The Romanoffs: Tsars of Moscow and Emperors of Russia. By H. Sutherland Edwards. (Allen & Co.)

MR. SUTHERLAND EDWARDS, who many years ago wrote a good book on Russia, has here put together some historical notices of the country. We feel, however, inclined to challenge the title of his book. Tsars of Muscovy we can understand; but why "Tsars of Moscow"? By the time the title of Tsar had been assumed by Ivan the Terrible in the middle of the sixteenth centure the Russian Tsars could claim a great deal more territory than the principality of Moscow.

The volume is interesting, but it is not free from inaccuracies. The reader is told that the evidence of Ivan's cruelty rests chiefly on the testimony of the Russian historian Karamzin; but is there nothing to say about the books of Taube and Kruse and Oderborn, who have left us such horrible records? There are also the diary of Jerome Horsey and the 'Russe Commonwealth' of Fletcher. Still, it is true that the story that Ivan caused the hat of a refractory ambassador to be nailed to his head is a very ancient legend, and was told of Drakula, a Moldavian prince, a hundred years before Ivan was born; and the story of the architect who, having built a church, had his eyes put out, that he might never erect a similar one for any one else, is told in connexion with many other princes.

It is difficult to understand why Mr. Edwards quotes the lectures of the Polish poet Mickiewicz as a leading authority on Slavonic history. They are at best but sketchy, and, coming from such an enemy of the Russians, must be used with caution. However good they may be when dealing with Slavonic poetry, the ethnological and philological views propounded in them are exceedingly crude. On p. 28 our author speaks of the republics of Novgorod and Pskov as being still independent in the time of Ivan IV., but in reality Novgorod had been annexed to the growing principality of Moscow as early as the year 1478. To say of Peter the Great that he "apparently himself killed his son" is to bring a terrible charge, which certainly lacks evidence. It would be more correct to say that he caused his son to be sentenced to death for high treason; new horrors are added to this tragic affair by such a gratuitous assumption. Nor is it correct to assert that he reformed the old Slavonic alphabet by introducing into it the symbols of sounds peculiar to the Russian language. No new symbols were introduced, but the alphabet was simplified by the removal of some old letters, or symbols, if you will. The Russian language does not appear to possess any sounds which were unknown to old Slavonic.

The supposed Slavonic origin of Justinian is alluded to, without a word being said of the important discovery made by Prof. Bryce, who has been able to show that there is not a tittle of evidence to support the story of the Slavonic parentage of the Byzantine emperor, and that it depends upon a document forged at the beginning of the seventeenth century. Again, why does Mr. Edwards fall back upon the authority of Sir Aston Cokaine (!) to prove that Ovid wrote verses in the language of the Gætae, when the poet expressly tells us so himself in a well-known couplet? That he wrote in any Slavonic tongue is quite a different matter, and would be, indeed, difficult to prove. We must first show that at the time there were any Slavs living in the neighbourhood of Tomi. Lastly, it is surprising that Mr. Edwards should have fallen into the error of supposing that the Slavs are mentioned in the 'Germania' of Tacitus. Would that such were the case! for then our trustworthy information about this race would be carried back four hundred years. Unfortunately we have no account of them which can be relied upon till the days of Jordanes and Procopius, about the middle of the sixth century A.D. Some smaller matters we pass over; and now, having done with fault-finding, we can honestly say that when our author gets to the reigns of the later Romanovs he seems to be treading on firmer ground. Yet here, again, he relies too much upon what must be called indirect authorities. The lectures of Mickiewicz are constantly referred to, and although it must be allowed that the memoirs of Prince Adam Czartoryski possess considerable value, still their point of view is not altogether an unprejudiced one.

In describing his first visit to Russia, as far back as the year 1855, when Nicholas had just died, our author is able to give us a more favourable opinion of the general condition of the country at that time than is commonly entertained. We have been told a great many things about the position to which Nicholas had brought Russia; but let us hear what Mr. Edwards has to say:—

"It is certain, at all events, that visiting Russia for the first time on the occasion of the coronation of Nicholas's successor, I could not recognize in the Russians of various classes with whom I was brought into contact, and with many of whom during a stay of eight months I became friendly and intimate, the mistrustful, suspicious, spy-fearing people of whom I had read. Above all they were not ignorant, nor were they dull.....No one, indeed, pretends that the cultivation of literature, art, and music was ever forbidden to the Russians; and conversation is not necessarily uninteresting or unintelligent because politics do not form the staple of it."

Our author also calls attention to the fact that some of the most brilliant Russian writers lived during the reign of Nicholas; for example, Pushkin and Lermontov the poets, Gogol the novelist, and Griboyédov, author of one of the best Russian comedies.

The pages of Mr. Edwards's book which will prove most attractive to the majority of readers are probably those in which he handles at considerable length the doctrine of Pan Slavism, that bête noire of our modern politicians. The views expressed by Mr. Edwards on Pan Slavism are undoubtedly sound. There is little chance of such an airy project being realized as the unification of Slavonic races; diversity of religion and language alone would prevent it. The Ultramontanism of the Pole is in strongest antagonism to Russian orthodoxy. There is great divergence in their languages; for although most of the roots are identical, it is no more possible for a Bulgarian and a Russian to hold a conversation together than for an Italian and a Spaniard. Mr. Edwards seems surprised at this; but it appears to be extremely natural. Whatever difference there may be between Russian and Bulgarian, it is certain that that between Serbian and the former language is far greater, and we must remember that all these belong to the eastern division of the race; the case is far stronger with Polish and Chekh, belonging to the western. The Pole, in his fierce hatred of the Russian—which is only second to that which he feels for the German—is not going to allow his independent traditions to be merged in Pan Slavism. His attitude towards his brother Slavs is egotistical and reserved.

Mr. Edwards does not seem to have read the later and more accurate works which have been written on Bulgarian history; but to go into all these ethnological details would indeed require more space than the Athenæum can afford.

There is a great deal of sound common sense in his book, and our author, although he does not spare the shortcomings of the Slavs, dares to give an honest opinion on many points, which will not, perhaps, in every case be welcome to the more prejudiced portion of his countrymen.

The World's Great Explorers.—Mungo Park and the Niger. By Joseph Thomson. (Philip & Son.)

ALTHOUGH we may doubt the value or expediency of these ever-extending series of small books, it must be admitted that a well-chosen adaptation of author to subject sometimes produces a volume of exceptional interest. The life and work of perhaps the greatest African explorer of the last century by one of the most distinguished and capable travellers of our own day is an instance of this. Mr. Thomson has the rare qualification of a personal acquaintance with the region of which he treats, and can thus speak with authority on the geographical questions involved, while peculiarly competent to sympathize with and appreciate the difficulties with which his hero had to contend. He has considerable literary facility, and it may be felt by some readers that this betrays him into occasional redundancy of style. We are rather disposed, however, to look on this as the index of a poetic temperament, keenly alive not only to the grandeur and beauty of natural scenery, but to the emotions produced by the awful solitude, the perpetual sense of uncertainty, and by the probable nearness of unknown danger—this last sensation being, according to Mr. Thomson's experience, the most trying of all to the solitary traveller. For most of us doubtless a halo of romance has long surrounded the story of Mungo Park, and it would be strange if Mr. Thomson, of all men, had not been impressed by its dramatic elements—the humble up-bringing in the remote Scottish homestead, where his imagination was fed with tales of Border chivalry; the introduction, as a young doctor, to Sir Joseph Banks, and the subsequent sudden plunge, at the age of twenty-four, into the heart of Africa; then his unexpected return and publication of the wonderful adventures, his second and much more elaborate expedition, and final disappearance. Mr. Thomson's emphatic estimate of Park's position among African explorers has, naturally, especial interest:—

"Neither then nor since has any African explorer had such a romantic tale to tell, nor has any out of the long list of adventurers who have followed told his tale so well. Some there have been who have flourished more theatrically across the African stage, and by virtue of striking dramatic effects, and a certain spice of bloodshed, have struck the imagination of those who are content with the superficial show of things, and are not too critical as to their significance. But for actual hardships undergone, for dangers faced, and difficulties overcome, together with an exhibition of the virtues which make a man great in the rude battle of life, Mungo Park stands without a rival. In one respect only—that of motive—does another surpass him. Here Livingstone stands head and shoulders above his predecessor, whose aspirations after personal name and fame, and apathetic attitude towards the anti-slavery movement, will ill bear comparison with the noble longings which inspired the great missionary."

This disparagement of Park's "aspirations after personal name and fame," of which we find no undue signs in his life, is curiously, but happily, corrected by the author himself in his next sentence, where he tells us that "throughout his whole narrative we fail to find the faintest trace of vulgar ambition or ignoble self-seeking. He deliberately suppressed incidents which would have added greatly to his fame!"

At all events, then, our biographer is no indiscriminate admirer. If he were, he would find it difficult to deal with Park's curious incapacity to perceive—even after Wilberforce and others had begun to appeal to the public conscience—the essential iniquity of the slave trade. That a man is not in advance of his countrymen on a philanthropic question is certainly no proof of exceptional insensibility; still it seems strange that a religious man, humane and affectionate by nature, should have witnessed, as Park did, all the horrors of the slave march, and yet apparently have seen in them only the inevitable though distressing incidents of a legitimate business. He did not even think that its abolition would have any "extensive or beneficial effect on the manners of the natives!"

Mr. Thomson's strong adverse comments on another point, viz., the formation of Park's second expedition, which consisted solely of Europeans, without any natives to do the harder work, seem justified by the tragic result. The traveller no doubt forgot that the moral stimulus of an absorbing interest, which kept his own energies and bodily powers alive, would be wanting to his followers.

The biography is prefaced by a most interesting sketch of the development of our knowledge of the geography of Western Africa, and by an eloquent description of the advance of Islam and of the great civilized Mohammedan negro kingdoms of Songhay and Bornu. The former after four centuries of prosperity fell to pieces, and the fanatical "Moors" were Mungo Park's bitterest enemies; but, as Mr. Thomson points out, fanaticism and decadence are not confined to Mohammedan kingdoms, and the rational means whereby the missionaries of Islam often propagated their faith were noticed by Park, and are recommended by our author to their Christian rivals. Very interesting also, though told only in the barest outline at the end of the volume, is Mr. Thomson's account of his own successful expedition, in the face of great difficulties, to establish trade relations with the chiefs of the Niger territories, by which means—the Government having fortunately recognized the importance of the questions involved—our commercial interests, founded on the labours of generations of "martyr" explorers, have been guaranteed against French and German encroachment.

We have, perhaps, hardly done justice to the graphic and effective way in which Mr. Thomson, as becomes a past master in African exploration, deals with the chief features of African travel, and it should always be borne in mind that the political and commercial disputes now rife in that continent require for their settlement, before all things, sound geographical knowledge.

NOVELS OF THE WEEK.

The Scudamores. By F. C. Philips and C. J. Wills. 2 vols. (Gardner & Co.)

The Baffled Conspirators. By W. E. Norris. (Spencer Blackett.)

The Shadow of a Dream. By W. D. Howells. (Edinburgh, Douglas.)

A Romance at the Antipodes. By Mrs. R. Dun Douglass. (Putnam's Sons.)

Truth with Honour. By Christabel R. Coleridge and M. Bramston. (Smith & Innes.)

THERE is movement enough in 'The Scudamores' for two or three novels, if not for a play. It is full of downright characters, English and American, polished and unpolished, serious and comic; and there is not a villain amongst them. The situations are well conceived, and as there are four or five young people, and two old widowers do the matchmaking and the matchmarring, the authors contrive to escape from the trite and commonplace into an atmosphere of wholesome freshness. Messrs. Philips and Wills put no strain upon their readers, and consequently secure their attention without effort or difficulty. The cleverness of their story is all on the surface. It is a narrative of incidents and humours, and it eschews analysis as completely as it avoids reflections and morals.

Mr. Norris has never had a happier thought for a novel, nor worked out his idea more felicitously, than in his bright story of 'The Baffled Conspirators.' The conspirators were four spoiled children of society, who formed a mutual protection league against the wiles of the piscatory sex, agreeing with each other that if either of them "saw that he was about to commit suicide" by swallowing a hook, he should consult his fellows, and be bound by their decision for the space of six months. Evidently there is room for any amount of sprightly writing within the four corners of that agreement, and Mr. Norris is sprightly on every page. His title is not so appropriate as it might be, for the conspirators are not baffled in the object which they set before themselves. The story has two heroines, and in the end there are only two bachelors left to lament, after greedily snatching at the bait, that they were contemptuously thrown back into the water. 'The Baffled Conspirators' is intentionally slight, but it is thoroughly picturesque and sparkling.

'The Shadow of a Dream' is a decidedly clever piece of work. One could hardly make a sound objection to any part of it as a mere piece of narration, and the circumstances giving rise to the ethical problem which serves for the plot of the story are contrived with ingenuity and originality. With Mr. and Mrs. March, who reappear in this story—Mr. March being the narrator—the reader of 'A Hazard of New Fortunes' is already acquainted. They have improved in being more concise and less prone to discuss trivialities, while they still preserve their characteristic qualities, and it is of the essence of the constitution of 'The Shadow of a Dream' that they still take a peculiar interest in questions as to what other people ought to do and think, or to have done or thought in certain circumstances. Judicious readers who have a less excitable conscience and less mercurial sympathies, while admiring the cleverness of Mr. Howells's story, will regret that he could not find something more vigorous to deal with. The book is too much like one of those elaborate pieces of "fancy work" which are not fit for use and yet serve no artistic purpose.

Mrs. Dun Douglass has worked up her diary of travel, added a few romantic incidents, and turned it out in the shape of a novel. Fact and fiction are oddly mingled in her rather bombastic narrative, the fiction including an Australian "lion of the day," a fat and florid Duke of Hammerton, "very much under the medium height," with the appearance and manners of a bagman; also a spirited English girl, Miss Giovannelli Brownell, of "a discontented disposition, grievous to see in one so young." The characters of 'A Romance at the Antipodes' may or may not be drawn from the life, but one does not manage to get up much interest in them.

There is some cleverness in the delineation of the two sisters who figure as heroines of 'Truth with Honour.' The writers to whom this story is due have probably prevented each other from risking any bold and exciting flight of fancy or imagination, but they have worked hard at the characterization of the heroines and their gambling father. This father is an amiable and in many senses a good man, but in at least one sense he is a bad man, and his daughters have to suffer for his sin. The contrast between the two women is finely drawn, and they are quite conceivable characters. The girl who has least sympathy with her father, and who craves, after a visit to some proper people, to reorganize the household, and have morning prayers like civilized families, is a very fair study from life.

THEOLOGICAL BOOKS.

The Epistle to the Hebrews: the Greek Text, with Notes and Essays. By B. F. Westcott, D.D., D.C.L. (Macmillan & Co.)—Since the publication of the epoch-making work of Bleek the interpretation of the Epistle to the Hebrews has become a much simpler task. At the present time the main points in debate are the date of the epistle and the readers for whom it was originally intended. The question of authorship must ever continue unsettled. Dr. Westcott's volume extends to about five hundred pages. It contains a long introduction, followed by the Greek text accompanied by various readings and notes on the successive verses of each chapter; while longer notes or essays are supplied at the end of the chapters. The commentary is thus extensive and complete—more so, probably, than any English one except Dr. Owen's. The author has aimed at thoroughness, according to his wont; and as he is a scholar whose range of reading is wide, and whose reflective power is considerable, he has produced a volume which deserves attention. The notes on various readings of the text are usually excellent, and of these a fair specimen appears at p. 110, where the conclusion arrived at is right, viz., συγκερασμένος τῇ πίστει τοῖς ἀκούσασιν (chap. iv. 2), which is Tischendorf's text also; not συγκερασμένους, adopted by the revisers of the New Testament. But the note on chap. ii. 9, advocating the common reading χάρτι, is unsatisfactory: χάρτις, although it is less supported by ancient MSS., and though it has found little favour among editors of the Greek Testament, is probably the original word. The translation furnished by the bishop is uniformly good and faithful to the original. The notes contain minute criticism, the shade of meaning in each word being looked upon as significant and as having been selected with care. Many of these explanatory notes are sound and satisfactory, as might have been expected. For instance, the note on p. 395 bringing out the meaning of the words "author and finisher of faith" is an admirable specimen of interpretation, where the revisers have vitiated the sense by inserting the pronoun "our." Whether the patristic citations and those from mediæval commentators add much to the value of the notes may be doubted; but they entered into the author's plan. The longer notes at the end of the chapters are sometimes short treatises on subjects arising out of the original text or cognate with its teaching, such as those on the pre-Christian idea of sacrifice, on the pre-Christian priesthood, the significance of Melchizedek, &c. Amid a multiplicity of theological terms, sentences, and subjects, a commentator's weaknesses and errors can hardly fail to appear. The main defect of this book lies in the parts of it which relate to quotations from the Old Testament, and in the description of the tabernacle or temple's furniture. In both departments ingenuity and artificial hypotheses on the part of the expositor are but too patent. Difficulties there are in the original; and the bishop should not only have seen them but encountered them in a different way. His standpoint is traditional rather than critical. He excels in settling matters belonging to text, but he is less trustworthy in exegesis. Metaphysical dogma is often superinduced on the exposition, so that few positions in the whole range of theology are passed over. The commentator's mind, which is not without an element of mysticism, is in full sympathy with the symbolic and allegorical. He explains the types in which the epistle abounds with evident partiality, finding profound meanings in the mysteries which the original educes; and fits them into the system he sets out with. In consequence of the author's bias towards mysticism, the reader will sometimes feel unable to form a clear conception of his meaning amid the multiplicity of the words he employs—words often technical and abstract. We admit that the exegesis of such an epistle cannot be separated from the doctrinal element; but the latter should be limited to its own sphere. It is no paradox to say that Dr. Westcott is too theological. The theologian is prominent throughout, believing as he does in the superlative value of the epistle, whose unknown author he persists in calling an "apostle," though he rightly judges that St. Paul was not the writer, and leaves it anonymous. The work, though valuable in many respects, cannot be accepted as altogether satisfactory. Yet the earnest and devout spirit which permeates the volume makes it a welcome contribution to the understanding of a unique epistle—an epistle which finds Christianity and its founder foreshadowed in the Jewish economy, especially in its sacrificial part.

The Prophecies of Jeremiah. Expounded by Dr. C. von Orelli. Translated by the Rev. J. S. Banks. (Edinburgh, Clark.)—Dr. von Orelli pursues the same method in this work as in his former one on Isaiah. It is divided into sections which are literally translated, an interpretation is added of the separate verses, including such Hebrew words as needed exegesis, and this is followed by an exposition of the whole division. The general introduction treats of all questions naturally belonging to the collection of prophecies embraced in the book. Dr. von Orelli writes clearly, and has evidently studied his subject with great care. He is well acquainted with the chief commentaries of his predecessors in the same field, and is able to judge their merits. The introduction is a useful summary of results, and will satisfy the wants of ordinary readers. The new translation is an improvement upon our English version, and reflects the Hebrew much more correctly. Thus xxiii. 26, 27, are rendered, "How long yet? Have the prophets who prophesy falsely and are prophets of the deceit of their own hearts, this in mind,—do they purpose to make my people forget my name for their dreams, which they tell every one to his comrade, like as their fathers forgot my name for Baal?" This translation follows a reading proposed by De Dieu which approves itself at once to the judgment. In like manner, much of the expository part is good, as is shown by this brief example relating to xxiii. 33-40: "The section on prophets and prophecy is closed by a warning against the use of the word Massah, introduced by earlier prophets as a designation of a solemn divine oracle, but abused by Jeremiah's contemporaries (the same word signifying burden) to deal secret blows at God's word. From the severity with which Jeremiah forbids the word Massah to the people as to the prophets, we may gather that the secondary sense was used in a thoroughly slanderous way, as if the word of the Lord was always a grievous plague, not a benefit to the land. Thus the phrase, while holy and divine in itself, became a perfidious by-word, throwing suspicion on the preaching of the genuine prophet, and so of the Lord Himself, as if the purpose of his speaking were to oppress instead of to save the people. In this way we can understand the sharp rebuke and warning uttered by Jeremiah." With regard to the text, the author rightly agrees with the scholars who prefer the Masoretic text to the Septuagint; but while mentioning a few places where the latter must be followed, he unduly depreciates the Greek readings, and his list should be enlarged. He defends the Masoretic text in x. 1-16, a passage which has the appearance of proceeding from the Deutero-Isaiah, and fails in supporting the genuineness of chaps. l. li., which were evidently written by an exile in Babylon. In interpreting the text the commentator betrays occasional weaknesses and errors, some of them arising from a view of prophecy which cannot be commended. His calculation of the seventy years' captivity, a period twice mentioned by Jeremiah, is incorrect. The commencement should not be calculated from 606 B.C., but from 597; seventy is merely a round number. The verses of the twenty-third and thirty-third chapters in which occurs the phrase "Jehovah our righteousness" are wrongly translated and explained. As Dr. von Orelli's standpoint is conservative, he often becomes apologetic, especially in the cases where certain critics have pointed out the non-fulfilment or partial fulfilment of prophecies to which Jeremiah's language scarcely corresponds. An example occurs in his treatment of the oracle respecting Damascus (chap. xlix. 23-27), where such expressions as "How is the city of praise not left, the city of my joy," are softened into, "Damascus the delight of the East will be greatly disturbed and damaged in the course of the coming war." The commentator fails to point out the fulfilment of this oracle, especially as Damascus exists and flourishes at the present day. In explaining the difficulty inherent in chap. xlv. 20-29, Dr. von Orelli has recourse to Nägelsbach's explanation, which is weak and insufficient. He is hardly able to solve difficulties from his own point of view, and does not give heed to the fact that Jeremiah's oracles were not committed to writing immediately after they were delivered. We regret that the author has been less influenced by some of the leading scholars who preceded him in the explanation of Jeremiah than in justice to his subject he should have been. Hitzig, Ewald, and Graf are of more consequence than Keil and Nägelsbach. Yet he has a sufficient share of independence to produce a valuable commentary, though it contributes but little to the clearing away of difficulties overhanging the text and some prophecies of Jeremiah's book.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

MR. FISHER UNWIN publishes Japan and the Pacific, and a Japanese View of the Eastern Question, by Mr. Manjiro Inagaki, a Japanese patriot who is under the impression that we were beaten at Kagoshima, and who thinks that Japan could, if she wished, keep a British fleet from attacking Russia on the Pacific. The first part of Mr. Inagaki's book, which is headed 'Japan and the Pacific,' appears to be his own, and is on the whole good. There are here and there little slips, such as those on p. 59 which appear to imply that Germany holds all New Guinea instead of less than one-fourth of that island, and at p. 29 the author seems to confuse Labuan and Sarawak; but, generally speaking, we have no fault to find with this first chapter. On the other hand, the remainder, and consequently the greater portion, of the volume is without plan or arrangement, and reads like an undergraduate's reminiscences of some lectures on modern history, possibly those of Prof. Seeley. The author apologizes in his preface most modestly for his English, but this, on the whole, is not bad as English goes. There are a great many slipshod expressions, but the meaning is generally clear. While, however, the writer thanks various distinguished persons for having revised his proofs, they undoubtedly stood in need of much more serious revision than they have received, and slips are numerous. As there is no index we are forced to name the pages on which those occur which we think it worth while to name. At p. 82 we have "Pyrenees," without any accents, although in a French phrase quoted from Louis XIV. On the next page "the Asiento" is misunderstood. At p. 107 we have "Xoscruscko" for the Polish chieftain, and not Freedom, but the critic, "shrieked" at such a fall; at p. 121 "Hypisilanda" for a well-known Roumanian-Greek prince; at p. 140 "Brunnon" for a celebrated Russian ambassador to St. James's; at p. 170 "Count Karserling"; at p. 178 "Prince Mikita of Montenegro." At p. 231 we have "Sindia" for Sindh; on the map at p. 233 "Damir" for Pamir; at p. 235 "Jaxartes" for the Jaxartes (the author seemingly thinking that the river is a town), and "the Bolon" for the Bolan; at p. 237 "Syr Adria" for Syr Daria, although Daria is correctly spelt upon the map. At p. 241 the river which on p. 237 is called "the Atrak," is styled "the Attric." The first sixty-nine pages form an excellent review article. The remainder of the work has not much interest for English readers, and will hardly find a public anywhere outside of England; for the author's fellow countrymen, if they can read English, will probably go to the original authorities, whose treatment of the subject is less confused than that of Mr. Inagaki. At the same time, we repeat that the first part seems to be his own, and if his own, as we believe, is a most remarkable performance for a foreigner. On his last page the author assumes the possibility for England of obtaining not only an Austrian and Turkish, but also a French alliance against Russia. We do not ourselves believe that even the readmission of France to a dual control in Egypt, coupled with the withdrawal of the British troops, would suffice to bring about an alliance between Great Britain and France against Russia, although the author may possibly have in his mind, in addition to these suggestions which he makes, that previous cession or sale to France by Germany of the conquered provinces which he elsewhere recommends to Germany as being in her own interest. He may doubtless contend that after such a cession there would be little to bind France to Russia.

MESSESS. KELLY & WALSH, of Hong Kong, send us (the London agents being Messrs. Sampson Low & Co.) A Handy Guide-Book to the Japanese Islands, which will be useful in a future edition when it has been expanded by its author. At the present moment it is a mere catalogue of places, and does not tell the traveller enough to be really useful. The work does not even contain that first necessity of a guide-book—an index.

The Winning of the West, by Mr. Theodore Roosevelt, 2 vols. (Putnam's Sons), is an excellent piece of literary workmanship. Mr. Roosevelt has had the advantage of consulting official manuscripts of which the contents have not been made public hitherto, and he has not omitted to use published documents also. In short, he has worked in the true historical spirit, and his book is a valuable addition to the historical literature of his country. Moreover, he has been able to take advantage of several years' experience acquired during his residence upon or near to what used to be called the frontier, being a part of his country which has disappeared, for all practical purposes, since the completion of railways across the continent. Now the United States are bounded on the east by the Atlantic and on the west by the Pacific Ocean, the intermediate part being as open to settlement and cultivation as any other parts of the vast territory over which the republic exercises dominion. There was a time, of which Mr. Roosevelt writes, when white men could not take up their abode on the soil of what is now the United States without danger and opposition from the Indians who were the first occupants of it. As a dweller for many years in the wilder and less populated part of his country, Mr. Roosevelt has seen the Indians in their wild state, and he has formed an opinion of them accordingly. What he saw with his own eyes confirmed what he had read, and his verdict upon the Indians is not favourable to them. That they have been harshly used by his countrymen he admits, but he is emphatic in stating that they are a peculiar and cruel race. When reviewing Mr. Roosevelt's previous works, we praised the admirable style in which they were written, and that praise may be repeated now. The present work is marked by the beauties of composition which we have admired in others from the same hand, and we can confidently recommend the two volumes which compose it to all students of American history.

The Brook and its Banks, by the Rev. J. G. Wood, M.A. (Religious Tract Society), was originally written for the Girl's Own Paper, and a few chapters have appeared in that publication. The complete work, we are told in the preface, is one of the last of the chatty and popular productions of the late author; to this we need merely add that it contains many illustrations, and appears calculated to foster a taste for natural history among the young people for whom it is designed.

MR. JAMES RUNCIMAN has collected a number of papers written during the last three years, and published them under the title of Joints in our Social Armour (Hodder & Stoughton). Probably they have appeared in newspapers or magazines, and no doubt they served their purpose well. But they do not possess any permanent interest; they are not striking enough in thought, nor do they contain any valuable information. They are for the most part vigorous lay sermons, calculated to attract attention; but in thinking them worthy of a place in literature Mr. Runciman has overestimated his influence.

The detective stories called Tracked and Taken, by Dick Donovan (Chatto & Windus), must be meant to appeal to the large class of undiscriminating readers. They are not worse than previous collections of stories by the same author and others, but they are very far inferior to the best specimens of police literature.

UNDER the title of Summer Days on the Thames: Recollections of Boating and Fishing between Henley and Oxford, there reaches us a cheap, but pretty reprint of an excellent illustrated work by Mr. Alfred Church, which appeared as a more costly gift-book in 1880 under the title of 'Isis and Thamesis.' The publishers are Messrs. Seeley & Co. True Thames-lovers' doctrine is taught by Mr. Church, who, though a fisherman, would preserve the otters from the traps of his angling friends.

THE Tales of Old Scotland, by Sheriff Rampini (Edinburgh, Macniven & Wallace), form a readable enough child's book on some leading incidents of Scottish history. The illustrations are pretty, and the knowledge displayed fairly up to the average of the day. The Sheriff's liking for Margaret, Canmore's queen, is obvious and not unjustified, though her Anglicizing tendencies must have been very distasteful as well as in some respects injurious to the Celtic Scotland of her day. Of the other famous queen, as yet uncanonized, he hints rather than avows a favourable view. Yet the bald chronicle of events is trying to Queen Mary's fame. Flodden is well described, but this sentence lacks some adjustment: "Piercingly cold, windy and rainy, the sufferings of the [Scotch] troops were of the most severe description."

We have on our table The Theory of Credit, by H. D. Macleod, Vol. II. Part I. (Longmans),—The Makers of Modern English, by W. J. Dawson (Hodder & Stoughton),—The Art of Authorship, edited by G. Bainton (Clarke & Co.),—Glances at Great and Little Men, by Paladine (Low),—Home Washing, by Louisa E. Smith (Bemrose & Sons),—A Course of Lectures on the Growth and Means of Training the Mental Faculty, by F. Warner (Cambridge University Press),—Lectures to Nurses on Antiseptics in Surgery, by E. S. Bishop (Low),—The Adventures of the Adventurers' Club, by Five Men and a Woman (Gardner & Co.),—A Black Business, by H. Smart (White & Co.),—Schoolboy Truth and Honour, by A. H. Biggs (Sonnenschein),—Agatha's Quest, by R. H. Sherard (Trischler & Co.),—Only a Fisher Maiden, by A. MacKnight (Digby & Long),—In Cloud and Sunshine, by J. Pierce (Trübner),—An Hour with George Herbert, by C. Bullock, B.D. ('Home Words' Office),—Sermons, 1877-87, by the Rev. A. Ryan (Dublin, Gill),—The Church of my Baptism and Why I Returned to It, by W. F. H. King (Burns & Oates),—A B C London and Suburban Church and Chapel Directory for 1890 (Banks & Son),—God in His World (Stock),—The Success of Christian Missions, by R. Young, F.R.S.G.S. (Hodder & Stoughton),—The Church; or, What do Anglicans mean by "The Church"? by J. B. Bagehawe, D.D. (St. Anselm's Society),—and Russes et Slaves, by L. Leger (Hachette). Among New Editions we have A History of Bridgewater, by S. G. Jarman (Stock),—The Pre-Columbian Discovery of America by the Northmen, with translations from the Icelandic Sagas, by B. F. de Costa (Albany, N.Y., Munsell),—Sir John Franklin, a Revelation, by J. H. Skewes (Bemrose & Sons),—The Life and Work of William Augustus Muhlenberg, D.D., by A. Ayres (Whittaker & Co.),—A Code of Morals, by J. S. Hittell (San Francisco, the Bancroft Co.).

LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

ENGLISH.

Theology.

Brown's (Rev. J. W.) An Italian Campaign: the Evangelical Movement in Italy, Letters of Rev. R. W. Stewart, 3/6
Letch's (M. and M. W.) Seven Years in Ceylon, Stories of Mission Life, imp. 16mo. 2/6 bds.
Meyer's (F. B.) Tried by Fire, Expositions of the First Epistle of Peter, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Morris's (E.) Hours of Meditation, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Murphy's (Rev. J. B. C.) Through Fast and Festival, Part 4, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.

Law.

Skelton's (J.) Handbook of Public Health: Public Health and other Sanitary Acts relating to Scotland, 7/6 cl.

Fine Art.

Great Artists: The Painters of Barbizon—Millet, Rousseau, Diaz; Corot, Daubigny, Dupré, by J. W. Mollett, cr. 8vo. 3/6 each, cl.

Poetry and the Drama.

Lofft's (R. E.) Sonnets, imp. 16mo. 2/6 cl.
Middleton (Thomas), edited by H. Ellis, Vol. 2, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl. (Mermaid Series.)

Philosophy.

Counsels and Maxims: 2nd Part of Schopenhauer's 'Aphorismen zur Lebensweisheit,' trans. by T. B. Saunders, 2/6
Symonds's (J. A.) Essays, Speculative and Suggestive, 2 vols. cr. 8vo. 18/ cl.

History and Biography.

Wrightson's (R. H.) The Sancta Republica Romana, Handbook to History of Rome and Italy, A.D. 395-588, 7/6 cl.
Yorkshire in Olden Times, ed. by W. Andrews, 12mo. 4/ cl.

Geography and Travel.

Hosie's (A.) Three Years in Western China, 8vo. 14/ cl.
Schweinfurth's (Dr. G.) Heart of Africa, cheap edition, 2 vols. cr. 8vo. 3/6 each, cl.

Philology.

Beyer's Norse and English Words and Phrases, cr. 8vo. 4/6 cl.
Cicero Pro Roscio, with Introduction and Notes by St. G. Stock, 12mo. 3/6 cl.
Schiller's Jungfrau von Orleans, edited by C. A. Buchheim, 12mo. 4/ cl. (Clarendon Press.)
Virgil's Æneid, Books 1-3, edited, with Introduction and Notes, by T. L. Papillon and A. E. Haigh, cr. 8vo. 3/ cl.

Science.

Ball's (J. B.) Handbook of Diseases of the Nose and Nasopharynx, cr. 8vo. 8/ cl.
Bunge's (G.) Text-Book of Physiological and Pathological Chemistry, translated by L. C. Woolridge, 8vo. 18/ cl.
Carnot's (N. L. S.) Reflections on the Motive Power of Heat, &c., edited by R. H. Thurston, cr. 8vo. 7/6 cl.
Cooke's (M. C.) Introduction to Fresh-Water Algae, cr. 8vo. 5/ cl. (International Science Series.)
Fitzgerald's (C. E.) Lectures on Physiology, Hygiene, &c. 2/6
Moll's (A.) Hypnotism, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl. (Contemporary Science Series.)
Richardson's (M. T.) Practical Blacksmithing, Vols. 1 and 2, cr. 8vo. 5/ each.
Richardson's (M. T.) The Practical Horseshoer, cr. 8vo. 5/ cl.
Slingsby's (R.) Treatise on Magnesium Flash Light Photography, 4to. 4/ cl.

General Literature.

Adams's (Mrs. Leth) My Land of Beulah, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Brown's (E.) Jack Abbott's Log, a Yarn of the Merchant Service, 2 vols. cr. 8vo. 2/1 cl.
Dante's Treatise De Vulgari Eloquentia, translated by A. G. F. Howell, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Dead Man's (A.) Diary, Written after his Decease, with Preface by G. T. Bettany, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Dickens (C.) and Collins's (W.) The Lazy Tour of Two Idle Apprentices, No Thoroughfare, &c., cr. 8vo. 8/ cl.
Gissing's (A.) A Village Hampden, 5 vols. cr. 8vo. 31/6 cl.
Murray (C.) The Nether World, 12mo. 2/ bds.
Hawthorne's (J.) The Spectre of the Camera, 12mo. 2/ bds.
In Durand Vile, by Author of 'Molly Bawn,' cheap edition, cr. 8vo. 2/ bds.
Lee's (T.) Stephanie, a Novel, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
Linton's (E. L.) Sowing the Wind, a Novel, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Mac Ritchie's (D.) The Testimony of Tradition, 8vo. 7/6 cl.
Murray (C.) and Herman's (E.) Wild Darrie, 12mo. 2/ bds.
Mugger's (Mrs.) Miriam, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl. (Low's Standard Novels.)
Newman's (F. W.) Miscellanies: Vol. 4, Political Economy, 8vo. 10/6 cl.
Ohnet's (G.) Dr. Rameau, trans. by Mrs. C. Hoey, 12mo. 2/ Ourousov's (Princess Mary) Education from the Cradle, trans. by Mrs. E. Fielding, 16mo. 2/6 cl.
Phillips (F. C.) and Willis's (C. J.) Byll Rye's Marriage, 2/6
Reade (Miss) and Turner's (Miss E. F.) Kewick Calendar, Autograph and Birthday Text Book, imp. 16mo. 3/6 cl.
Rivett-Carnac's (late Col. S.) The Presidential Armies of India, 8vo. 10/6 cl.
Schaff's (P.) Literature and Poetry, Studies on the English Language, 8vo. 12/ cl.

FOREIGN.

Theology.

Bellesheim (A.) Geschichte der Katholischen Kirche in Irland, Vol. 1, 432-1509, 15m.
Darstellungen aus dem Gebiete der Nichtchristlichen Religionsgeschichte, Vols. 1 and 2, 5m. 75.
Hauck (A.) Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, Division 2, Part 2, 6m.
Kraus (A.) Lehrbuch der Praktischen Theologie, Vol. 1, 7m.

Fine Art and Archaeology.

Benndorf (O.) Wiener Vorlegeblätter f. Archäologische Übungen, 1889, 12m.
Diehl (C.) Excursions Archéologiques en Grèce, 4fr.
Imhof-Blumer (F.) Griechische Münzen, 40m.
Junghändel (M.) Die Baukunst Spaniens, Part 3, 25m.
Koldewey (R.) Die Antiken Baureste der Insel Lesbos, 80m.
Liebenann (W.) Organisation d. Römischen Vereinswesens, 10m.
Rupin (E.) L'Œuvre de Limoges, 50fr.

Poetry and the Drama.

Fagnet: Notes sur le Théâtre Contemporain, Second Series, 3fr. 50.
Robert (F.) La Poétique de Racine, 7fr. 50.

Philosophy.

Bilharz (A.) Metaphysik als Lehre vom Vorbewusstsein, Part 1, 4m.
Bonhöffer (A.) Epictet u. die Stoik, 10m.
Lippert's (V.) Thomas v. Aquino u. die Platonische Ideenlehre, 3m.

History and Biography.

Duparc (E. de la B.) Nouveaux Récits Militaires, 7fr. 50.
Fournel (V.) Les Hommes du 14 Juillet, 3fr. 50.
Franklin (A.) La Vie Privée d'Austrois: Comment on devenait Patron, 3fr. 50.

Lavisse (E.): La Vie Politique à l'Etranger, 1889, 3fr. 50.
Thiaucourt (C.): Les Causes de la Seconde Guerre Punique, 1fr.

Geography and Travel.
Marmier (X.): Au Sud et au Nord, 3fr. 50.

Philology.
Kleinpaul (R.): Die Rätsel der Sprache, 10m.
Lexicon Lingue Hungarice. Evi Antiquioris, ed. G. Szarvas et S. Simonyi, Paris 1-13, 26m.

Science.
Blanchenhorn (M.): Beiträge zur Geologie Syriens, 30m.
Fritsch (G.): Die Elektrischen Fische, Part 2, 30m.

General Literature.
Jellinek (M. H.): Die Sage v. Hero u. Leander in der Dichtung, 3m.

Maupassant (G. de): Notre Cœur, 3fr. 50.
Montégut (M.): Les Six Monsieur Dubois, 3fr. 50.
Pontmartin (A. de): Episodes Littéraires, 3fr. 50.
Quatrelles: Double Face, 3fr. 50.
Rhins (D. de): La Bohème Militaire, 3fr. 50.
Tineau (L. de): Stras et Diamants, 3fr. 50.

'AN INTERESTING EVENT,' BY M. A. TITMARSH.
11, Savile Row, W.

THIS is the title of a pamphlet published by David Bogue at 86, Fleet Street, in 1849, which has just come into my possession. It contains sixteen pages, and is enclosed in a blank pink wrapper.

I have never before heard of its existence. Have any of your readers?

The pamphlet puzzles me. It is in Thackeray's style, and refers to Beaumoris and the Megatherium Club; but why should he, having finished 'Vanity Fair' and begun 'Pendennis,' have diverged to write a trifling tale like this?

On the other hand, how could it profit anybody to forge it? This copy was bought on a bookstall for a trifle three or four years ago, and I have never heard of another. It is not in the British Museum, and I do not find that it was actually published in 1849. It may be a unique copy of a contemplated production.

CHAS. P. JOHNSON.

MR. EDWARD COLBORNE BABER.

WE regret to announce the death of the Chinese scholar and well-known traveller Mr. Edward Colborne Baber, who died of fever a few days ago at Bhamo, in Upper Burma. His health had for a long time been a cause of anxiety to his friends. A long service in China and a period of residence at Seoul, in Korea, had laid the seeds of a persistent aguish fever which two long leaves in England were insufficient to eradicate. Mr. Baber was educated at Christ's Hospital, and when a 'Grecian' proceeded with an exhibition to Magdalene College, Cambridge. While at the University he met with an accident the effects of which he was never able to shake off. On one occasion, when travelling from Cambridge to London, the train was thrown over an embankment, and though Mr. Baber escaped at the time with nothing worse than a severe shaking, the effect on his nerves was such that it was ever afterwards with the greatest repugnance that he undertook a railway journey. This disinclination to travel by train was a common cause of disappointment to his friends, and gave annoyance to those who were unaware of the cause. In 1866 he entered the China Consular Service, and was sent to Peking to study the language of the country. After an unusually short apprenticeship, owing to the great ability he showed in mastering this incomparably difficult language, he was sent to one of the consulates, and subsequently rose rapidly through the lower grades of the service. Already he was a marked man, and when in 1875 Mr. Grosvenor was sent to Western China to inquire into the circumstances connected with the murder of Mr. Margary in Yunnan, Baber was chosen to accompany him. In this and all the other journeys he made he showed a keen geographical sense, and all the other qualities which constitute a scientific traveller. When, as a consequence of Margary's murder, the Chefoo Convention was drawn up (under the terms of which Chungking, on the Yangtze Kiang, was to be opened as a treaty port), Mr. Baber was sent to examine into the capabilities of the port and into the features of the surrounding country. Readers of the Journal of the Royal Geographical Society will remember the graphic and brilliantly written monograph on his travels with which he favoured that periodical. In 1879 he was appointed to the important post of Chinese Secretary of Legation at Peking. In 1885 he was sent to act as Consul-General in Korea. After a year's residence in Seoul he returned to England on a much-needed leave, at the expiration of which (1888) he went out to Burma to take part in the delimitation of the Burmo-Chinese frontier. Active employment and ill health prevented Mr. Baber from undertaking any large literary works. His papers contributed to the Journal of the Royal Geographical Society and his edition of Gill's 'River of Golden Sand' are the only literary remains left us. His death, at the early age of forty-seven, will be a deep grief to all those who were privileged to enjoy the friendship of one who was always genial, kind, and brilliant, and of whom it may truly be said that in him there was no guile.

WASHINGTON'S ANCESTRY.

MR. H. F. WATERS claims in his article (ante, p. 770) that "we see now why the name [of Lawrence Washington] was entered on the parish register as Mr. He was Magister Artium." To genealogists it will occur that what "we see" is that the writer's acquaintance with our parish registers must indeed be slight if he imagines that their use of the style "Mr." refers to the degree of M.A., or, indeed, to any university degree whatever. J. H. ROUND.

87, Newgate Street, June 21, 1890.

MR. WATERS has written you a long letter in re Washington family, and complains he cannot get at the Bishop of London transcripts. I understand some of them are up in the dome of St. Paul's, awaiting the next conflagration in London, and some at Fulham Palace.

E. W. STANFORD.

THEORIES ABOUT JUNIUS.

IF a candidate for the Indian Civil Service were questioned as to the authorship of the letters signed Junius, the reply would probably be that they were written by Sir Philip Francis. If the candidate were further questioned as to his authority, he would undoubtedly answer Macaulay. The examiner might heartily approve of the candidate's answers.

It is not a flight of imagination to suppose that some eminent living men of letters have but a vague acquaintance with the Junius problem. Indeed, it is at the request of one of them, whose 'Manual of English Prose Literature' is a standard work, that I now deal with the theories about Junius. After my contributions to the Athenæum on 'Facts about Junius and Francis' had appeared, Prof. Minto wrote a letter which he has authorized me to make public, and from which I extract the following passages, not because they are laudatory of what I did, but because they justify me in trying to do more:—

"Your articles struck me as being conclusive as against the case of Francis, and to me they are novel at every point, except such points as I heard from you by word of mouth....By all means give us the other paper on theories about Junius. The Franciscan theory has almost swallowed up the others in the public mind, and few of us have any idea of the strength of the cases possible for others. I, at least, have never carefully examined any other theory."

Not long afterwards I received a letter from Washington, the writer being Mr. John S. McCalmont, an attorney and counsellor-at-law, who had given his leisure moments during many years to a study of the Junius problem, and who had arrived at the conclusion that the evidence was against the claim advanced on behalf of Francis. Mr. McCalmont stated that he had read the articles in the Athenæum after delivering a lecture on Junius before a literary society in Washington, and he was good enough to request that I should pursue the subject, "separate the true from the false data," and set forth in greater detail than I had done "the honest facts." I may infer, then, that a desire exists for a complete statement of the case.

I am quite conscious of the potency of the reasons which impel so many persons, whenever this question is discussed, to demand that a definite conclusion should be arrived at. They say in substance, "produce your Junius." They dislike being told that the secret of an anonymous writer has been preserved, and it appears to them a right course to believe in Francis for the lack of another idol. Having no sympathy with those who worship false gods, I prefer criticizing idolatry to sharing in its folly.

Before setting forth the theories relating to others than Francis, I may notice and endeavour to dispose of Macaulay's contention that Francis must have been Junius. The main points of Macaulay's argument are that five marks exist in Junius and Francis, and that not more than "two of them can be found in any other person whatever." The fact is that the five marks do not exist in the case of Francis, and are pure assumptions with regard to Junius. Macaulay also states that Junius was a passionate and savage man, who attacked individuals with ferocity, and "regarded the most defective parts of old institutions with a respect amounting to pedantry"; and he maintains that such was Francis's character almost to the letter. Francis was irascible and virulent; Burke and Barré, to name but two eminent men in Parliament when Junius flourished, were as hot-tempered and vituperative as Francis, and if these failings suffice to excite a suspicion in his case, they would do so equally in the cases of others. Far more important is the divergence between Francis and Junius in their political views. The former was what would now be called a Radical in politics; the latter was a very philosophic Whig. Indeed, as Sir James Mackintosh pointed out in the Edinburgh Review for June, 1826, the peculiarity of Junius was to agree implicitly with George Grenville in politics, while it is known that Francis differed from him. This divergence is enough to invalidate Macaulay's hypothesis, even if the five marks had existed in the cases of both men.

Mr. Joseph Parkes compiled a list of forty-two persons who have been named among the possible writers of the letters signed Junius; by adding Dr. Wilmot and Mason to it, on whose behalf a claim has been preferred which is not more ridiculous than that advanced for others, and the Earl of Shelburne, who was considered by many contemporaries to be Junius, the total number is forty-five. The list can be shortened by the very easy process of striking out the names of those who never ought to have figured in it. Thus eight disappear at once; they are Chatham, Chesterfield, Gibbon, the Duke of Portland, De Lolme, Mrs. Macaulay, Grattan, and Wedderburn. Three more must go if the denial of each be accepted, as I think it ought to be; they are Lord George Sackville, Burke, and the Earl of Shelburne. I should eliminate the following names on the ground that no adequate reasons have been assigned for their inclusion; they are those of Hugh M. Boyd, Dr. Butler, Flood, General Lee, John Roberts, George and James Grenville, Dyer, Greatrakes, Glover, Sir William Jones, Hollis, Maclean, Rosenhagen, Kent, Wray, Rich, Dr. Francis, Pownall, Dr. Wilmot, Horne Tooke, and William Burke. Those who remain number twelve; they are Wilkes, Hamilton, Lloyd, Lord Temple, Horace Walpole, Mason, Dunning, Lord Lyttelton, Cornwall, a Junto or set of writers, Barré, and Sir Philip Francis. I shall reduce the number to a small one by striking out the names of Wilkes, Hamilton, Lord Temple, Lloyd, Dunning, Lord Lyttelton, and Barré. Mr. Dilke was of opinion that Wilkes might have been Junius, and I entirely agree with him in thinking that much of Wilkes's writing was in the strain of the great unknown, yet I cannot think that he was the man. Though "single-speech" Hamilton has been generally credited with having written the letters, not even a plausible case can be made out for him. When Grattan talked over the matter with Samuel Rogers, he said :—

"Three persons are credited with having the best claim to the authorship of Junius's letters—Gibbon, Hamilton, and Burke. Gibbon is out of the question. I do not believe that they were Hamilton's; because a man, who was willing to be known as the author of a bad piece, would hardly have failed to acknowledge that he had written an excellent work. I incline to think that Burke was Junius."

The mere opinion of any one, however distinguished, does not carry weight in the absence of evidence, or where the point at issue is other than one of taste. When a great artist or a great writer is asked what he thinks about a particular painting or a particular book, his opinion cannot but excite interest, though it may be entirely fallacious. Artists and men of letters of note are often as prejudiced as the humblest person who ever handled a brush or used a pen. I do not consider what Grattan has said to be conclusive of the question under discussion, neither do I subjoin the following utterance of Adam Smith for any other reason than that many persons may feel curious to learn his view. When Samuel Rogers visited Edinburgh in 1789, he had a chat with Adam Smith on the 19th of July in that year, and recorded in his diary :—

"Talked of Junius. Adam Smith suspected 'single-speech' Hamilton to be the author. He was told by Gibbon that when Hamilton one day paid a visit at the Duke of Richmond's in Sussex, he told him that there was a devilish keen letter from Junius in the Public Advertiser of that day, and mentioned some of the passages. The Duke was anxious to see it, but when the paper came there was an apology in it for its not appearing. It was a letter to the Duke of Richmond, and the last that appeared. As long as they were attributed to Lord Lansdowne, Burke, Germain, &c., they went on, but as soon as they were said to be Hamilton's they were dropped."

The foregoing passage is to be found at pp. 94-5 of Mr. Clayden's 'Early Life of Samuel Rogers.' While Grattan held that Hamilton was not Junius, Adam Smith appears to have thought that he was. Between these opinions of two most distinguished men the impartial public has entire liberty of choice.

The story told by Adam Smith is chiefly remarkable from having been communicated to him by Gibbon. A similar one was published in Dr. Mason Good's introduction to Woodfall's edition of 'Junius.' It is said, at p. 11, the late Duke of Richmond told George Woodfall, the son of the printer of the Public Advertiser, that Hamilton had stated to him and Sir John Peachey, when riding through the park at Goodwood, the substance of a forthcoming letter from Junius; that the letter did not appear on the following day, but appeared later. The explanation given is that Hamilton was well acquainted with Woodfall, and might have learnt from him about a particular letter being in type. This is reasonable enough; but this explanation does not dispose of the story, which appears in another form and with another object in John Britton's work designed to show that Junius was the mask for Barré. At pp. 8-9 Britton relates how the Rev. Dr. Popham, Vicar of Lacock and a frequent visitor at Bowood, which was not far off, informed him that, being at dinner there one day, when the others present were Shelburne, Dunning, and Barré,—

"Junius was not only noticed, but a certain attack on his writings, which had just excited much attention, was freely discussed. On this occasion one of the party remarked, that it would be shown up and confuted by Junius in the next day's Advertiser. When the paper came the next day, instead of the Junius, there was a note by 'the Printer,' stating that the letter would appear in the ensuing number 'Thenceforward,' said Dr. Popham, 'I was convinced that one of my three friends was Junius.'"

I repeat what Mr. Dilke has already said in substance, that it is difficult to reconcile these two stories. He points out there was nothing new in attributing the authorship of the letters to Lord Shelburne, and that the following letter, addressed to him, appeared in the Morning Chronicle on the 29th of December, 1770 :—

"Your lordship will hardly think there is a man in England who does not believe you to be the author of those letters which are signed Junius..... Mr. Dunning and that arch-fiend Col. Barré, will perhaps claim the honour of writing those letters; but, my lord, they are to be looked at in the same light as the carpenter and mason employed by Sir Christopher Wren."

That Shelburne did not stand in the same relation to Junius that Wren did to St. Paul's may be affirmed on the testimony supplied by him, assuming, of course, that his words have been correctly reported. A week before his death, in 1805, as Marquess of Lansdowne, he told Sir Richard Phillips, in answer to the remark "that many persons had ascribed the letters to him,"—

"No, no, I am not equal to Junius; I could not be the author; but the grounds of secrecy are now so far removed by death and change of circumstances, that it is unnecessary the author of Junius should much longer be unknown. The world are curious about him, and I could make a very interesting publication on the subject. I knew Junius, and I knew all about the writing and publication of these letters.....If I live over the summer, which, however, I don't expect, I promise you a very interesting pamphlet about Junius. I will put my name to it; and I will set that question at rest for ever."

He subsequently added :—

"I'll tell you this for your guide generally, Junius has never yet been publicly named. None of the parties ever guessed at as Junius was the true Junius. Nobody has ever suspected him. I knew him, and knew all about him, and I pledge myself, if these legs will permit me, to give you a pamphlet on the subject, as soon as I feel myself equal to the labour."

According to the foregoing passage, the real Junius was not even suspected; Francis had been suspected. Moreover, the reasons given for disclosing the secret were that death and changed circumstances had altered the conditions under which it had been kept. Francis was not only alive then, but he was an active member of the House of Commons; George III. was alive also, and if Francis were the author of the 'Letter to the King,' it would have been awkward for him, to say the least, to be identified with Junius. Lord Lansdowne intimates that he "knew Junius"; this implies that Junius was dead; he would not have used this phrase if he had the living Francis in his mind. While Lord Lansdowne's disclaimer of being Junius can be unhesitatingly accepted, his statement as to his knowing the secret does not seem improbable to those who, since his life was written by Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice, have learnt how much he was behind the scenes in politics, and how closely he resembled what in American political slang is called a "wire-puller." That he was generally suspected of having a share in the work done by Junius is a matter of public notoriety. An entry in the unpublished Woodfall manuscripts exhibits how an energetic Liberal, as well as a great dramatist and orator, regarded the marquess in connexion with the subject under discussion. The entry is dated the 13th of February, 1813, and is to the effect that Sheridan said he had often talked over the matter of Junius with Woodfall, and that his own mind "was strongly possessed with the idea that those letters originated at Shelburne House."

If the objection be raised that Junius must have kept his own counsel, otherwise his secret would have been discovered, I should meet it with the following extract from the Public Advertiser, which, so far as I know, has been overlooked by the writers about Junius. It is dated the 9th of August, 1771, three months before Garrick, having stated Junius would cease to write, caused Junius to send a note to Woodfall, saying that he "would not survive a discovery three days," and it is signed "Cautio" :—

"To Junius : a caution. Be assured that the hand of a treacherous friend has at length withdrawn the curtain which concealed your more immediate connexions from the eyes of the Administration. The same perfidy that has exposed them to the vengeance of an incensed Cabinet, will shortly sacrifice you at the shrine of ministerial power."

The only persons whose claims I have yet to consider are Walpole and Mason, a Junto, Cornwall, and Sir Philip Francis. Strange though it may appear to many, there is less improbability of the letters signed Junius being the joint production of Walpole and Mason than of their having been written by Francis. On the 17th of May, 1851, Mr. Dilke filled several columns of the Athenæum with speculations on this head, and although he carefully avoided on that occasion, as on others, presenting the public with a Junius, he stated that there was a "physical possibility" that Walpole and Mason might be the joint authors of the letters. I do not think Mason was publicly named at the date of Lord Lansdowne's communication to Sir Richard Phillips. He had succeeded in startling as well as mystifying the public with his 'Heroic Epistle,' in which George III. is ridiculed as unparagonably in the pages of the Public Advertiser. As Mr. Dilke's ingenious speculations are reprinted in the 'Papers of a Critic,' the inquiring reader is referred to that work for further details. I may add, however, that in the unpublished correspondence between Suard, a notable French journalist, and Wilkes, the former, in acknowledging the receipt of verses which I take to be Mason's 'Heroic Epistle,' asks whether the writer of them was not also the writer of Junius's prose. I have tried, but in vain, to learn whether the papers of Suard are in existence. If they are preserved, many interesting letters from John Wilkes and others will be found among them.

The notion that Junius was but one of a series of writers, or a Junto, has this to recommend it—that such an hypothesis reconciles many difficulties and fits in with several remarks in the private letters from Junius to Woodfall. One of Woodfall's correspondents, Anti-Sejanus, informed him :—

"I am alarmed to see in yours of yesterday the acknowledgment of the receipt of a letter signed 'A Friend to Anti-Sejanus,' of which neither myself, nor any of my friends, are acquainted with the writer. As it is one of our signatures, I hope your candour will suppress it, if there is anything in it that may discredit any of the party."

Francis is the last name but one on the list of supposed authors of the letters. On another occasion I may have something to say about Cornwall. I have dealt with Francis before, and when I do so at length again it will be in an article on 'Junius and his Contemporaries.' At present I content myself with quoting two passages from Hayward's 'Correspondence,' which have not received the notice they deserve. In November, 1867, Hayward, an anti-Franciscan, wrote 'More about Junius'; he added to the article and had it reprinted in pamphlet form and circulated among his friends. Lord Chief Justice Cockburn read it, and said what Col. Tomline reports in a letter to Hayward: "You may like to know that Sir A. Cockburn, a good judge, told me at dinner that your reasoning was unassailable; that he had been a Franciscan, but now was thoroughly converted by you." A letter from Mr. W. F. Finlason contains the best statement of the case as against Francis which I have met with. I may recall that Francis, without distinctly affirming to his second wife that he was Junius, led her to suppose he was, and left behind him a copy of Taylor's 'Junius Identified' addressed to her, he being the person named in that book. This is held to be conclusive evidence. Dr. F. Brockhaus, who has written a work in German on the letters of Junius, holds that it solves the problem. Let those who agree with him read the following sentences in Mr. Finlason's letter to Hayward:—

"The real Junius had 'setts' and the private letters; the former, at all events, were meant for preservation, and would not be destroyed by him, at all events till death. The real Junius had them at his death; he either kept them, or destroyed them then. If he kept them they are extant, and their production is the only satisfactory proof. If he destroyed them, it must have been because he did not desire to leave any trace of the authorship, as a passage in his letter implies. 'I am the sole depository of my own secret, and it shall die with me.' In either view, Francis cannot have been he. For he clearly did desire (if we can rely upon his widow) to leave proofs of the secret. Then why did he not leave the conclusive proof? Any one might have the books he left; they don't go beyond, and, indeed, refuse to be aided by, his final statements. So that it only comes to this, that he said he was the author. But that shows he wished to be so considered, and if he were the author he had the real proofs in his possession, and those he must have suppressed!"

W. FRASER RAE.

SALE.

In the sale of valuable books and manuscripts held by Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge on June 14th and three following days we must be content with quoting the principal articles. Augustin de la Ciudad de Dios, MS. on vellum, with superb illuminated borders, executed for the Anti-Pope Benedict XIII. whilst Cardinal de Luna, 210l. Officium B. Marie Virginis, MS. on vellum, with nineteen miniatures, by an Italian artist for Pope Alexander VI., 200l. Audubon's Birds of America, 300l. Bartolozzi and his Works, by Tuer, 60l. Bewick's Birds, large paper, 20l. Arabian Nights, by Burton, three copies, 22l. 10s., 19l., and 17l. 7s. 6d. Ainsworth's Tower of London, first edition, 12l. 5s. Bradshaw's Railway Tables, first edition, 11l. Burns's Poems, first edition, 72l. Horse in Usum Romanum, 25l. Keats's Poems, first edition, 26l. 15s. Lamb's Prince Dorus and Beauty and the Beast, first editions, 49l. 10s. Hubbard's New England, 25l. Hulsius's Collection of Voyages, wanting three parts, 150l. Kingsborough's Antiquities of Mexico, 25l. Thackeray's Snob and Gownsmen, 91l., and a separate copy of Gownsmen, 37l. Persian Drawings of Kings, &c., 26l. Shaw's Dresses, large paper, 52l. 10s. Montesquieu, Temple de Guide, 60l. The result of the sale was 3,605l. 12s. 6d.

THE RIGHT OF QUOTATION.

30, Maiden Lane, W.C.

I OBSERVE in a recent number of the Athenæum an aggrieved letter from Mr. S. Waddington on the subject of a sonnet I quoted in Public Opinion, and reprinted from a review in your own columns unless my memory mislead me. The name of Mr. Waddington and that of his publisher were given, and the sonnet submitted to the readers of Public Opinion as an example of current literature.

If Mr. Waddington had written to thank me for bringing his name and work under the notice of his countrymen in all parts of the world who have probably heard of neither, I should not have been surprised—such courtesy is not without precedent; but I must confess his peremptory threat of legal proceedings fairly filled me with wonder. I apologize, however, in all humility for the wrong I have done him in thus endeavouring to spread his literary reputation against his will—an error I promise him never to repeat.

If you call the attention of your readers to the enclosed correspondence, it might act as a warning to other editors and spare Mr. Waddington the annoyance of further publicity.

I may add this is the first complaint of such a character that has occurred since the paper was started in 1861, and unless the nature of poets undergo a complete change, will probably be the last.

PERCY WHITE,
Editor of Public Opinion.

 We have no room to print the correspondence.

AMERICAN COPYRIGHT.

MR. HAVEN PUTNAM in his letter to the Athenæum (June 21st) says that the late Copyright Bill "was defeated by the votes of the 'Solid South,' the South-West, and the Far West—by states like Texas, Arkansas, Missouri, Mississippi, Nevada, &c." The English author, noting the dimensions of the region to be converted before his rights can be secured, will hardly be reassured by my friend's prophecies. Being myself a native of the South, and acquainted with some of its Congressmen, I am convinced that Mr. Putnam is mistaken in supposing them ignorant of the subject; but I do not think your space can be usefully occupied with conjectures concerning the motives which influenced the majority. It is sufficient for my contention that the rights and interests of the author were too little embodied in the Bill for its defeat to be accepted as a verdict upon them. "The Copyright League," says Mr. Putnam, "propose to continue the fight from Congress to Congress until the rights of authors have been secured, and literary property has been given the same safeguard as is given to other property." Yet the Copyright League "formulated" this Bill, which, as I have shown, does not secure authors their rights, and does not give literary property the safeguard of other property. By it the author loses his property unless he can sell it at a particular time—that time being before the property can be fairly appraised. Other property is not subjected to compulsory sale. It is something to have from the Secretary of the Publishers' Copyright League the admission that this restriction is "open to criticism," for it could only have been inserted in the interest of the class of which Mr. Putnam is an eminent representative—the publishers. It is obviously against the interest of American authors, for it gives publishers freedom to pirate all the foreign works they decline to pay for. The American author would still have to compete with unpaid foreign books that had not secured simultaneous publication in that country. The Bill drafted by the Authors' League, as I have been informed, allowed the foreign author several months between registration of title and publication, but this margin was removed after it had "called into its counsels" the publishers.

Mr. Putnam's comment on this part of my statement (in the Athenæum, June 14th) is disappointing. As he does not deny the injustice, it might fairly be expected that, as a publisher, and Secretary of the Publishers' Copyright League, he would promise his aid in removing the unjust clause from the Bill which he regards as still "pending." Instead of this he vainly tries to question its importance. Mr. Putnam's suggestion of the facility of sending typewritten duplicates of MSS. to American publishers would be more to the point were publishers infallible in their judgment of the value of unpublished works. But from the time of 'Robinson Crusoe'—refused by every publisher in England—until now, many valuable, even popular, works have found difficulty in reaching the public. Carlyle's earlier books, Hawthorne's 'Tales,' could only appear on payment or guarantees by the friends of those authors. 'Robert Elsmere' was declined by a great American house. Some years ago, while acting in London as literary adviser for an American house, I recommended negotiation for a book I did not like, and which afterwards enjoyed large sales in both countries. The house declined it, and the head of it—one of the cleverest publishers in America—acknowledged his blunder. This is not the only instance in my experience.

Nor is it a sufficient redress that the new author, though his first book be lost, may gain by the second. He may not live to write a second, and his family may see their rightful inheritance passing to pirates. Nor does it compensate for a thousand pounds lost that another thousand is saved.

In my letter to the Athenæum of June 14th, I understated the importance of the wrong in question. Laws are not made to restrain the honest, but the dishonest. The Copyright Bill must be judged by the restraint or the immunity given to the dishonest. Let us imagine a dishonest American publisher. It is rumoured that some of the great New York houses, in order to fight Western pirates, have established Western branches, under disguising names, to publish cheap editions of their foreign works. This may not be the case, but it is possible. Let us suppose the MS. of a new English work sent to a dishonest American publisher. It is kept for a convenient time, then returned to the author with thanks, too late for him to negotiate further in America without too much delay. Meanwhile, however, a copy has been retained and printed in America, and soon after the book's appearance in London it is published by John Doe & Co. in Chicago! The charge of theft is escaped by allowing just time enough for a conceivable copy to be transmitted to America, and set in type. The book might, indeed, be stolen from the stealer, but there are many books that would be practically secured by priority on the market of a cheap edition. The author would have given the pirate the "tip."

There is premium enough on dishonesty in the book trade already, without adding to it. And I will here express the belief that there will never be perfect confidence and cordiality between authors and publishers until in the home trade also every copy of a book sold bears in it the author's private and numbered mark. As for the scheme of "open publishing," I am ready to abandon it for any other that will detach the simple question of an author's right to his royalty from the trade disputes and competitions in which it is entangled. I have but dwelt on the immorality of the defeated Bill. It has other faults: one of these leans to virtue's side—it cannot pass Congress. If Mr. Putnam and the Copyright League suppose that a majority of Congressmen oppose a literary labourer's right to his wages, pur et simple, let them fearlessly submit that principle to Congress on its own merits. They are now virtually asking Congress to destroy the smaller publishing houses, deprive many hands of work, and treble the price of foreign books, in order to swell the gains of great houses, and give the mass of authors Dead Sea fruit.

Mr. Putnam is mistaken in his assumption that American authors are opposed to "open publishing." In a gathering of eminent authors of Boston, where I was present, the scheme was thoroughly discussed and approved by the fourteen or fifteen who made the company. The American author's interest is simply to have his English competitors paid wages, and if this can be secured by the "open" or any other scheme he has no reason to oppose it, unless he be also in the publishing business. I might quote eminent names too, but this is a thing to be determined by arguments. The only discussion which has reached the public on the "open" scheme was that in the Nineteenth Century. The eminent objectors gave vent to much indignation against piracy, but their arguments were few. However, every difficulty or danger besetting the new scheme which they pointed out was seriously weighed by those who advocate the plan. They were all submitted to able lawyers and statesmen, and a measure prepared which, it is believed, will meet all objections—except mere wrath. All fraudulent ingenuities, forgery of authors' trade-marks, alteration of copy, &c., are dealt with; every purchaser is given a pecuniary interest in discovering frauds; room is left for special contracts, enabling a favoured publisher to get his editions first on the market. Authors are paid for their stamps on delivery, redeeming such as are not used—this being done through an American bureau, or agent of the author. British authors might prefer another plan; but we must often practise the philosophy of the Grand Duchess: if we cannot get what we set our heart upon, we must set our heart upon what we can get. It is too soon to affirm that we cannot get this. At any rate, as a half century of effort has failed to carry any other scheme in Congress, common sense suggests trial of a new one. "The essential thing," as Mr. Putnam describes it, "to secure a recognition of the right of aliens to possess literary property," is, I submit, surrendered by the defeated Bill, which deprived of their property aliens who could not get publishers at a given moment, and it is secured by a measure which compels payment on every copy sold of the aliens' work.

MONCURE D. CONWAY.

Literary Gossip.

In our next number we shall publish our articles on the continental literature of the past twelve months. They include Belgium by MM. E. de Laveleye and P. Fredericq, Bohemia by M. Cermák, Denmark by M. Petersen, France by M. J. Reinach, Germany by Hofrath Zimmermann, Greece by M. Lambros, Holland by Miss Van Campen, Italy by Commendatore Bonghi, Norway by M. Jøger, Poland by M. Belcikowski, Russia by M. Milyoukov, and Spain by Señor Riaño.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN announces a reprint of Mary Wollstonecraft's 'Rights of Women,' the original edition of which was issued nearly a hundred years ago. Mrs. Fawcett has contributed a critical introduction to the new edition, in which she discusses the social condition of women then and now.

MESSRS. FIELD & TIER are going to bring out 'London City: its People, Streets, Traffic, Buildings, History,' by Mr. W. J. Loftie. It will be enriched with at least 250 illustrations of London city as it is to-day, engraved in Paris from original drawings by Mr. W. Luker, jun., and will be printed on special paper.

MR. F. M. ALLEN, the author of 'The Green Bag,' is going to bring out, through Messrs. Ward & Downey, a new book under the title of 'Brayhard: the Strange Adventures of One Ass and Seven Champions.' It will contain about thirty-seven original illustrations by Mr. Furniss. Messrs. Ward & Downey will also publish next month a new two-volume novel by Sarah Tytler, entitled 'Sapphira,' and an historical romance, 'Locusta,' by W. Outram Tristram, author of 'The Red Lamp.'

SIR EDWIN ARNOLD has promised to write for Scribner's Magazine three articles upon Japan and Japanese life. Mr. Robert Blum, who was sent out by the Magazine, has now arrived in Japan, and is making the drawings to illustrate these articles, under the guidance and suggestion of the author himself.

MISS HARRIET W. PRESTON has made a translation of Frederic Mistral's Provençal poem 'Mireio,' which will be published late in the summer by Mr. Fisher Unwin. It will have a frontispiece by Mr. Pennell. Miss Preston has also written an article on the south of France, including Avignon, Arles, Nîmes, &c., which will run through the July and August numbers of the Century. Mr. Pennell made a special journey through Provence in order to illustrate it.

THE admirers of the clever verses of Mr. Warham St. Leger that have been appearing in the columns of Punch for some time past will be glad to know that Mr. David Stott is about to publish them under the title of 'Ballads from Punch.'

THE 'Life of Admiral Collingwood,' on which Mr. Clark Russell is engaged, and which Messrs. Methuen will publish next year, will contain a number of hitherto unpublished letters addressed by the Admiral to Sir Edward Blackett. Those relating to Lord Howe and the 1st of June are said to be of historic interest.

MR. F. C. BURNAND has been writing a burlesque of Mr. H. M. Stanley's book 'In Darkest Africa,' which will be published by Messrs. Trischler & Co.

'THE LOST EXPLORER,' a romantic story of Australian life and adventure, by Mr. J. F. Hogan, the author of several works on colonial subjects, will shortly be issued by Messrs. Ward & Downey.

MR. STANFORD is going to publish in July a volume of 'Camping Voyages on German Rivers,' and the streams dealt with are the Werra, Weser, Neckar, Rhine, Moselle, Main, Moldau, Elbe, and Danube. It relates the adventures and misadventures of three travellers in their skiff on these waters.

THOUGH the United States can boast of more histories than history, yet another large work is projected with the title 'The Makers of America.' Mr. Mabie is to edit it. The contributors include President Adams of Cornell University, Prof. Sumner of Yale, Mr. Bayard Tuckerman, Mr. James Schouler, Col. Higginson, and Mr. Barrett Wendell. These gentlemen will describe the explorers, inventors, theologians, authors, soldiers, and statesmen who have distinguished themselves as "Makers." It is not yet settled who will deal with the publishers who, by appropriating the works of English authors, have made fortunes and given their country the leading place among piratical states.

RADICAL changes having taken place in the constitution of the firm, Messrs. Remington are going to alter their style to Eden, Remington & Co. It is rumoured that a large publishing firm in Paternoster Row is to be turned into a limited company, the shares being retained in the hands of the present partners.

THE American House of Representatives is not only averse to international copyright, but is professedly ignorant of the conditions under which copyright exists. No member of that body seems to be aware that, under the common law of England—which the colonists in their dependent state regarded as their birthright, and which American jurists, since the colonists became independent of the mother country, style the inheritance of American citizens—copyright in printed books or in unpublished manuscripts is perpetual. Till the statute of Anne there was no limit to the term of the author's enjoyment of the product of his brain, and his heirs or assigns could succeed to his privilege. This perpetual copyright still exists and is recognized in the case of letters in manuscript, and the person who has printed a letter without the formal permission of the writer or proprietor can be compelled by a court of law to cease the publication. Few Americans know this, and as few know that at present, while any American can obtain copyright in England, no English author can secure copyright in America. The first State in America to grant copyright by statute was Connecticut. In 1783 the Assembly of that State passed an Act entitled, "For the Encouragement of Literature and Genius," according to which every inhabitant of the United States who had written a book or pamphlet should have "the sole liberty of printing and vending the same." A condition was made about the price being reasonable, corresponding to the condition in the statute of Queen Anne.

MR. HERBERT SPENCER will contribute to Mind an article on 'Space-consciousness,' in reply to the Neo-Kantians.

WE are sorry to hear that Mr. F. A. Suttaby, whose death we recorded last week, has left his widow and family in needy circumstances. An appeal is being made by some of the friends of the deceased to raise funds for their requirements, which we hope will be liberally responded to.

THE death is announced of the Rev. Dr. John Baillie, formerly of the Free Church, Linlithgow, author of 'A Memoir of the Rev. W. H. Hewitson of Dirleton,' published by Messrs. Nisbet & Co., and other works. After leaving Linlithgow he became a clergyman of the Church of England, and at the time of his decease he was rector of Wyvenhoe, in Essex. We also hear of the decease of Mr. J. C. Scholes, of Bolton, a local antiquary of repute. He wrote 'Bolton Bibliography' and other works, and was a member of the Lancashire and Cheshire Antiquarian Society. Intelligence comes from America of the death of the Rev. Dr. Moffat, of Princeton, New Jersey. He was born in Galloway, N.B., in 1811, and in early youth emigrated to America, where he obtained several professorships. He was the author of a life of Dr. Chalmers and other works, and contributed to serial literature. M. Cuzin, the celebrated French binder, is also dead.

WE hear that a grant of 150*l.* from the Royal Bounty Fund will be made to Mr. Ben Brierley, the Lancashire writer. Mr. Brierley had a sudden and serious attack of illness recently, from which we believe he has now recovered.

WE greatly regret the death of Major-General C. B. Brackenbury, R.A., one of the ablest of writers on military subjects. He had, owing to War Office regulations, put his name to but few books, though he was a frequent writer in the columns of the public press, and had often contributed to the Times and Standard as well as to many other journals. Some of his anonymous articles—as, for example, one which appeared in a review in the winter of 1886-87—were most remarkable. Major-General Brackenbury was a brother of Lieut.-General Henry Brackenbury, with whom he has been confused in some obituary notices. He held at the time of his death the appointment of Director of Artillery Studies.

The Law Quarterly Review for July will contain an article on 'The Law of Conspiracy in England and Ireland,' by Mr. J. G. Butcher (in reply to Mr. Kenelm E. Digby). Mr. Henry Bond, of Trinity Hall, will write on 'Possession in the Roman Law'; Mr. H. W. Elphinstone on 'The Alienation of Estates Tail'; Mr. T. G. Carver on 'The Bills of Lading Act'; Mr. Horace Nelson on 'Marriage and Immoveables'; Mr. A. Wood Renton on 'The Legal Test of Lunacy'; and Mr. F. W. Verney on 'The Recent Maritime Conference at Washington.' 'A Song of Uses,' by an eminent pure conveyancer, will also be among the contents.

In a recent report on the yearly publications in Bengal the officiating Director of Public Instruction recorded his opinion that English education has hitherto but little influenced the Bengali mind. There have been no original publications in any department of learning. Journalism and politics, not always of a respectable character, seem to wholly occupy the educated talent of young Bengal.

We regret to record the death of Prof. Ivan Pavlovich Minayeff, which occurred on June 13th at St. Petersburg. The deceased scholar was well known amongst Orientalists as a Pali scholar of many years' standing, and a writer on subjects connected with Buddhism. Prof. Minayeff had also several times visited the chief Buddhist countries, where he made collections of MSS.

THE Government of India has decided to discontinue the annual grant hitherto devoted to the search for and purchase of rare Sanskrit MSS., but the decision will not take effect until 1892. A regular staff of native searchers have been employed during the past ten years, and these have visited most of the large temples throughout India, examining and cataloguing the vast collections of works hoarded up in those fanes. The private libraries of many native gentlemen have been likewise carefully sifted and their contents recorded. Out of the MSS. thus examined no fewer than 2,400 have been purchased by the Government, and rendered accessible to the public at Bombay and Calcutta. The most valuable "finds," as our readers are doubtless aware, have included numerous old Jain MSS., now being submitted to the scrutiny of competent scholars in Bombay. Although the search and purchase grants are to cease, the Indian Government has agreed to continue the allowance of 9,000 rupees per annum for the publication of texts and translations of the Sanskrit and Persian works discovered.

A NEW and revised edition of Canon Eden's 'Churchman's Theological Dictionary,' with a preface by the Rev. H. C. G. Moule, is to be published by Mr. Elliot Stock.

THE full title of Sir F. Pollock's volume which we announced last week is 'An Introduction to the History of the Science of Politics.' It originally appeared, not in several magazines, as we inadvertently said, but exclusively in the Fortnightly Review.

THE most interesting Parliamentary

Papers of the week are Historical Manuscripts Commission, Twelfth Report, Appendix, Part VI. (2s. 2d.); Sweating System Committee, Index, Part I. (4s. 3d.); British Museum Accounts (9d.); Statistical Abstract for the Principal and other Foreign Countries, 1878 to 1887-8 (1s. 2d.); Further Correspondence relating to Cyprus (7d.); Tables showing the Progress of British Merchant Shipping (6d.); Science and Art, Thirty-seventh Annual Report (1s. 6d.); Annual Statement of Navigation and Shipping for 1889 (3s. 1d.); Finances of Brazil (3d.); and Trade and Navigation Accounts for May (6d.).

SCIENCE

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

Service Chemistry: being a Short Manual of Chemistry, and its Applications in the Naval and Military Services. By V. B. Lewes. (Whittingham & Co.)—The tendency of chemical textbooks to get into one groove, to be merely variations, mainly as regards size, of one common plan, has for a long time been getting more and more marked; it is, therefore, both surprising and gratifying to come across a book showing such marked originality in design and treatment as does Prof. Lewes's 'Service Chemistry.' It is a book written for a special class of readers, yet we know of no work that we would sooner place in the hands of any one commencing the study of chemistry, and we venture to say that there are few chemists who would not find in it much important matter which would be quite new to them. The nature of the task which Prof. Lewes had set himself is, perhaps, best shown by a quotation from his preface:—"In the absence of any text-book dealing with the chemical treatment of subjects of such paramount importance to the services as explosives, fuel, drinking waters, boiler incrustation, corrosion and fouling of ships, paints, ventilation, &c., it became necessary to prepare one for the officers passing through the Royal Naval College; and in doing so, I have endeavoured to develop in a rational way the main facts of the science, and the theories which are deduced from them, and have then amplified those portions which touch on service questions as fully as possible; whilst those parts of the subject which are likely to be of less immediate importance to the readers for whom the book is intended, are condensed as far as is advisable. Whilst using the title 'Service Chemistry' I wish it to be clearly understood that there is but one chemistry, and that its technical adaptation to any special subject is merely an amplification of the science in a particular direction, which cannot be properly done without, at the same time, mastering the general principles of which the technical application merely forms a small branch, and that a knowledge of the chief principles and theories of chemistry is absolutely essential before any useful application of the science is possible." Prof. Lewes has well carried out the plan thus sketched; especially must we commend the way in which the practical bearing of almost every chemical fact mentioned is brought out. As was to be expected, the subjects with which the author's name has been especially connected, the corrosion and fouling of iron ships, and the means for their prevention, meet with adequate treatment—in fact, the chapter dealing with these points forms the best contribution we know of to the literature of the subject. Finally, there is, what is so often wanting even in scientific books, a very full index. We trust that this book will meet with such success as to induce Prof. Lewes to give us a work in which the bearings of chemistry on the affairs of common life are treated as successfully as he has here shown its relation to military and naval matters.

Coloured Analytical Tables. By H. Wilson Hake. (Philip & Son.)—This book, intended for medical students and for use in schools, is distinguished from its numerous competitors by a decidedly unique feature. In place of the at best rather vague descriptions of the colours of the products of the various reactions dealt with, we here have hand-painted imitations of the actual colours. The idea is a good one, and has been most successfully carried out, the matching of the tints being in nearly all cases extremely close. It seems likely to be of service to students having but limited time for laboratory work. The strongest objection we see to it is the danger that it may induce students to dispense with performing the actual experiments. The tables themselves are clear, concise, and thoroughly sufficient for their purpose, namely, the detection of the acid and base in a simple salt, methods of separating the members of the different groups not being treated of.

Nautical Surveying. By the late Vice-Admiral Shortland, LL.D. (Macmillan & Co.)—Admiral Shortland died on October 17th, 1888, and the work before us, which must have been the labour of many years, has been brought out by his widow and children. Readers are not favoured with any preface or explanation as to whether any part of it was in type before the distinguished author's death, or to whom they are indebted for the care with which it appears to have been passed through the press. Admiral Shortland entered the navy (in which his father was a captain) in early life; but the indications he showed of great mathematical ability led to his being sent to Cambridge in 1838, where, after a successful university career, he graduated as seventh on the list of Wranglers in 1842 (the year in which Prof. Cayley was Senior). He subsequently rejoined the navy, and was employed for many years on the survey branch for which his abilities so eminently fitted him, retiring from active service in 1870. Being dead he yet speaketh, and his posthumous work on nautical or naval surveying will probably long continue to be used as a text-book for advanced students on the subject. The land surveyor knows nothing of that large portion of the land which is covered by the waters of the sea; but the knowledge of its configuration is obviously of great importance to the navigator, and the more complete this is, especially near the coast-lines, the greater will be the security, ease, and therefore rapidity, with which his voyages may be performed. Whenever possible the nautical surveyor avails himself of the accurate determinations of the places of the conspicuous points of reference which are visible from the sea, and have had their positions fixed by land observations; elsewhere he has recourse to astronomical observations, his principal instrument being, of course, the sextant. A highly important part of his duty consists in obtaining the depth of the water along the coast-line by soundings; and in doing this account has to be taken of the state of the tide. Another is the determination of the magnetic variation in different parts of the oceanic regions. We cannot enter here into the complications connected with this subject owing to the changes produced, especially in iron ships, by the changes in the position of the vessel. It is well known that Sir George Airy, when Astronomer Royal, gave much attention to these, and made some valuable suggestions with the object of neutralizing as much as possible local effects of the kind.

SIR W. W. SMYTH, F.R.S.

A VERY wide circle of mining engineers, including old students of the Royal School of Mines in almost all parts of the world, will hear with profound regret of the sudden death of Sir Warington Wilkinson Smyth. As Chief Inspector of Mines for the Crown and for the Duchy of Cornwall he had been brought during a long period into close relationship with the mining interests of this country. In Cornwall, where he had a seaside residence, few men were better known or more respected; while in London Sir Warrington's was one of the most familiar figures in scientific society. Much of the frankness and heartiness which were striking features of his character were probably due to his early connexion with the sea. He was born near Naples in 1817, while his father, Admiral Smyth, the distinguished astronomer and numismatist, was conducting a survey of the Mediterranean. As a student at Cambridge young Smyth acquired great reputation as an oarsman, and rowed on the Thames in the University race of 1839. From Cambridge he proceeded as a travelling bachelor to the Continent, and spent four or five years in visiting the most important mining districts of Germany, Austria, and Hungary. Extending his tours into Turkey and Asia Minor, he obtained the materials for a work which he published in 1854 under the title of 'A Year with the Turks.' To his early travels and to his boyish life on the shores of the Mediterranean may be traced his remarkable linguistic attainments, which extended beyond the languages of Western Europe, and led to his holding up to the time of his death the position of Foreign Secretary of the Geological Society—a society of which he was also at one time the President.

Through the influence of Sir H. T. De la Beche he became attached to the Geological Survey as mining geologist, and in this capacity contributed to its publications some valuable memoirs, especially on certain mining districts in Wales and in Ireland. When the School of Mines was established in 1851, Mr. Smyth was appointed Lecturer on Mining and on Mineralogy, and the lectureship on mining he retained until the day of his death, defying all the efforts of "the Department" to make him go to South Kensington. In connexion with the exhibitions of 1851 and 1862, and as a representative of this country at various continental exhibitions, he rendered valuable services to the mining community; but his most important labours were those performed between 1879 and 1886 as chairman of the Royal Commission on Accidents in Mines. It is understood that the Report of this Commission was mainly from his own pen. Sir Warrington was not only a most attractive public speaker, but a writer of great ability, though the technical character of his writings stands in the way of their being generally known. His 'Treatise on Coal and Coal Mining,' now in its seventh edition, has been translated into several languages, including Chinese.

Although possessing a strong physical constitution, Sir Warrington had been suffering for some time from heart disease; and while engaged in his study on Thursday, the 19th inst., with the examination papers of his mining class spread before him, he suddenly and peacefully expired. He leaves a widow—the sister of Prof. Nevil Story-Maskelyne, M.P.—and two sons, one in India and one at Cambridge.

THE MARINE BIOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION.

The annual meeting of the Marine Biological Association was held on Wednesday afternoon last in the rooms of the Royal Society, Burlington House. Sir Henry Thompson, F.R.S., was in the chair, and among those present were Dr. Evans, Treas.R.S., Prof. Michael Foster, Sec.R.S., Mr. E. L. Beckwith, Mr. I. S. Lister, the Prime Warden just retired of the Fishmongers' Company, Prof. Jeffrey Bell, Prof. Stewart, and Mr. A. Sedgwick. The adoption of the Council's report was moved by Admiral Sir E. Ommanney. Attention may be drawn to the inquiries instituted into the destruction of immature fish, the close attention which is being given to the cultivation of the sole and the natural history of the oyster, to the improvement in the hatching of the eggs of the plaice in the Aquarium at Plymouth, and to the increase in the number of students and investigators who have made use of the laboratory. In the treasurer's report, the adoption of which was moved by Dr. Hickson, the sum of 150*l.* was stated to have been received from the rent of tables, as against 45*l.* in the preceding year. A special vote of thanks was accorded to the Fishmongers' Company, Mr. Thomasson, M.P., and Mr. Frank Crisp, for their generous gifts to the Association. We regret, however, to report a slight falling off in the annual subscriptions, as this is not to the credit of the naturalists of this country.

Prof. Huxley has found himself obliged to resign the office of president, and the difficult task of replacing him has still to be faced.

THE MUSEUMS' ASSOCIATION.

The Museums' Association—an infant institution started last year at York—has just held its first annual meeting at Liverpool, under the presidency of the Rev. H. H. Higgins. It is to Mr. Higgins, the chairman of the Museum Subcommittee, that the arrangement of the splendid collection of invertebrata in the Liverpool Free Museum is mainly due. His presidential discourse, delivered on the 17th inst., was divided into three sections, (1) "The Father of Natural History Museums," being a sketch of the life of Conrad Gesner, the famous naturalist of Zurich; (2) "Museum Appliances," a description of certain practical details of importance to curators; and (3) "The New Knowledge," an attempt to show that the highest aim of a public museum should not be the mere multiplication of facts in the memory of the visitors, but rather the kindling of a sympathy with nature. The President's address was followed by a brilliant conversation in the museum, at which the principal citizens of Liverpool were present.

On Wednesday morning the business commenced with a paper on 'Museum Organization,' by Prof. Boyd Dawkins, in which he explained the system adopted in the new museum at Owens College. Mr. Rudler then read a paper advocating the formation of a central committee of reference, to aid provincial museums in naming natural history specimens: a paper which incidentally gave rise to much discussion as to whether a scientific specialist or an intelligent all-round man makes the best curator. Dr. Sorby sent for exhibition some examples of his new method of mounting specimens of invertebrates. Mr. Moore, the Curator of the Liverpool Museum, gave a sketch of the history of the institution under his care; and Mr. Chard, one of his assistants, then described the system adopted at Liverpool of sending out small cabinets of typical specimens on loan to elementary schools.

The business on Thursday morning was opened with a paper by Mr. Willoughby Gardner descriptive of the Moscow Museum. Mr. Cameron, of Sunderland, discussed the best means of rendering museums attractive; and Mr. Howarth, of Sheffield, rapidly read a paper on 'Museum Cases and Museum Visitors.' Several other communications announced for reading were necessarily postponed, in consequence of the time occupied in discussing the formal articles of constitution of the Association.

There was no lack of hospitality during the meeting. The Mayor of Liverpool entertained the members at luncheon in the Town Hall on Wednesday; and on Thursday Mr. J. L. Bowes received the party at the opening of his magnificent private museum of works of Japanese art. On Wednesday afternoon the party visited Chester, with the special view of inspecting the Grosvenor Museum, through which they were conducted by Dr. Stollerforth and Mr. Shrubsole. Friday was also devoted to excursions.

The Liverpool meeting was unquestionably a success, and if the same energy is shown in future as was displayed on this occasion—especially by Mr. Platanauer, the honorary secretary, and by Mr. Tobias, Mr. Macmillan, and other members of the local committee—the Museums' Association promises to become as important a body as the Library Association. The next meeting will be held in 1891 at Cambridge.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—June 19.—The Treasurer, Dr. J. Evans, in the chair.—The following gentlemen were admitted into the Society: Rev. Dr. Kerr, Prof. W. H. Perkin, Mr. D. Sharp, and Mr. W. F. B. Weldon.—The following papers were read: 'On the Determination of some Boiling and Freezing Points by means of the Platinum Thermometer,' by Mr. E. H. Griffiths; 'On the Relation between the Magnetic Permeability of Rocks and Regional Magnetic Disturbances,' by Prof. Rücker; 'On the Causes of the Phenomena of Terrestrial Magnetism, and on some Electro-mechanism for exhibiting the Secular Changes in its Horizontal and Vertical Components,' by Mr. H. Wilde; 'On the Alleged Slipping at the Boundary of a Liquid in Motion,' by Mr. W. C. D. Whetham; 'Redetermination of the True Weight of a Cubic Inch of Distilled Water,' by Mr. H. J. Chaney; 'On Wind-pressure upon an Inclined Surface,' by Mr. W. H. Dines; 'On the Action of Oils on the Motions of Camphor on the Surface of Water,' by Mr. C. Tomlinson; 'On the Plasticity of an Ice Crystal: Preliminary Note,' by Mr. J. C. McConnel; 'Preliminary Note on a New Magnetometer,' by Prof. W. Stroud; 'On the Course of the Fibres of the Cingulum, and the Posterior Parts of the Corpus Callosum and Fornix in the Marmoset Monkey,' by Dr. C. E. Beever; 'On the Changes produced in the Circulation and Respiration by Increase of the Intra-cranial Pressure or Tension,' by Mr. W. Spencer and Prof. V. Horsley; 'On the British Earthquakes of 1889,' by Mr. C. Davison; 'On the Harmonic Analysis of Tidal Observations of High and Low Water,' by Prof. G. H. Darwin; 'An Experimental Investigation of the Central Motor Innervation of the Larynx,' by Dr. F. Semon and Prof. V. Horsley; and 'Contributions to the Molecular Theory of Induced Magnetism,' by Prof. J. A. Ewing.—The Society adjourned over the long vacation to November 20th.

BRITISH ARCHAEOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION.—June 18.—This was the closing meeting of the session, Rev. S. M. Mayhew being in the chair.—The discovery of an ancient dungeon in Lancaster Castle was announced by Dr. Harker. An apparently solid block of walling having attracted attention, an effort was made to penetrate the mass. Traces of an opening were soon met with, and a curious vaulted chamber, which must have been closed for many years, was laid open to view.—Mr. Loftus Brock described a small leaden badge found in London, similar to the pilgrims' signs, consisting of one-half of a Tudor rose joined to a comet-like tail.—Mr. J. W. Grover exhibited some iron keys worked to patterns of great beauty, one of which, found many years ago at Hitcham Rectory, Bucks, was probably the key of a reliquary. A Roman knife-handle, carved with figures, a dog chasing a rabbit, of almost unique workmanship, found at Dorchester, was also exhibited.—The Chairman described a large and remarkable series of ancient articles brought by him for exhibition. Among the most curious were three small Roman bowls, perfect, found in London, several beautiful examples of Roman glass, and a British urn found a few weeks ago at Burgate, Canterbury, thus rendering evidence of occupation of the city anterior to the Romans. Of later date was a head of the Saviour, found in Cripplegate, and a small gold reliquary picked from a barrowful of old iron!—A paper was read by Mr. Wood on two of the round-towered churches of Essex: South Ockenden, St. Nicholas, and Bardfield Sailing, St. Peter and St. Paul. These two completed the description of the churches (six in all) in the county which possess round towers, the others having been previously described. South Ockenden has been "restored" in recent years, and its identity destroyed. During the process the ancient hour-glass was thrown away with the rubbish, but was fortunately recovered by the village blacksmith, and is now replaced. Bardfield Sailing Church is known to have been dedicated in 1380, and this date agrees with the appearance of the workmanship, although the base of the tower, like the first example, is probably of much older date.—A paper was read by Mr. Macmichael on ancient horn books, and several specimens were exhibited, some of which were lent for the purpose by Mr. J. Evans.—The proceedings terminated with a description of a Roman column and its base of large dimensions, which has just been found in Water Gate Street, Chester, by Mr. Alderman Brown, who, with great public spirit, has preserved the remains in situ. The base is on the level of the street, showing that the latter must have existed at the same time, without regard to the levels of the mediæval "Rows," which are much above it.

NUMISMATIC.—June 19.—Anniversary Meeting.—Dr. J. Evans, President, in the chair.—The Secretary, Dr. B. V. Head, announced that the Council had unanimously awarded the Society's medal to M. J. P. Six, of Amsterdam, for his distinguished services to the science of numismatics, as exemplified by his numerous articles on Greek, Lycian, Cyprian, and Phœnician coins, contributed during the past twenty years to the Numismatic Chronicle and to foreign publications.—The President then read his annual address.—The following gentlemen were elected as officers and Council for the ensuing year: President, Dr. J. Evans; Vice-Presidents, H. Montagu and Dr. H. Weber; Treasurer, A. E. Copp; Secretaries, H. A. Grueber and Dr. B. V. Head; Foreign Secretary, W. Wroth; Librarian, Dr. O. Codrington; Members of the Council, Rev. G. F. Crowther, A. J. Evans, Prof. P. Gardner, Rev. Canon Greenwell, R. A. Hoblyn, C. F. Keary, L. A. Lawrence, General G. G. Pearse, Prof. R. S. Poole, and A. Prevost.

ZOOLOGICAL.—June 17.—Mr. W. T. Blanford in the chair.—Mr. Selater exhibited and made remarks on a mounted head of a Pallah antelope, obtained by Capt. F. Cookson on the Cunene river, in South-Western Africa, which was distinguished by its black face from the ordinary form of the Cape Colony. Mr. Selater also exhibited a large photograph of Grévy's zebra (Equus grevyi), taken from the specimen in the Natural History Museum at Paris by Mr. G. Bolton.—A specimen of Pallas's plover (Egialitis asiatica), obtained in May last near Great Yarmouth, and now in the Norwich Museum, was exhibited; and a note upon its occurrence by Mr. T. Southwell was read.—Letters and communications were read: from Prof. F. Jeffrey Bell, containing some notes received from Mr. E. Thurston, of the Madras Museum, on the habits of the penatuliids of the genus Virgularia,—from M. P. A. Pichot, on the locality on the Lower Rhone in which the beaver is still found in its native state,—by Mr. W. Bateson, on some cases of repetition of parts in animals (he also exhibited a series of specimens illustrative of this subject),—by Mr. H. G. Smith, on the diurnal Lepidoptera collected by Mr. W. Bonny, of the Emin Relief Expedition, on the river Aruimi, Central Africa,—from Mr. W. L. Distant, containing descriptions of some Hemiptera collected by Mr. Bonny during the same expedition,—from Mr. H. W. Bates, on some of the Coleoptera collected by Mr. Bonny,—by Mr. H. Druce, on ninety-five new species of Lepidoptera Heterocera from Central and South America,—by Mr. G. A. Boulenger, on the secondary sexual characters in the South African tortoises of the genus Homopus,—from Mr. W. L. Selater, on the Indian species of the family Muridae,—from Mr. J. T. Cunningham, on the secondary sexual characters of the genus Arnoglossus; the author showed that the so-called Arnoglossus lateralis is only the female of A. lophotes,—by Mr. R. B. Sharpe, the sixth part of his series of notes on the Hume Collection of birds, the present communication treating of the Coraciidae of the Indian region, and containing descriptions of three new species,—from Miss E. M. Sharpe, on a collection of Lepidoptera made by Mr. E. Reynolds on the rivers Tocantins and Araguaya, and in the province of Goyaz, Brazil,—and by Mr. E. S. Hall on the occurrence of a persistent right posterior cardinal vein in a rabbit.—The Society adjourned until November.

ANTHROPOLOGICAL INSTITUTE.—June 10.—Prof. Flower, V.P., in the chair.—The Chairman exhibited a "ula" or fetish brought by the Rev. L. O. Warner from the neighbourhood of Lake Nyassa.—Mr. T. Bent read a paper 'On the Nomad Tribes of Asia Minor.' He referred in the first place to the heterogeneous mass of nationalities on and around the Cilician plain, but took only one point for discussion, namely, the religion of the Ansaree around Tarsus, identifying this cult with that of the Ali-ullah-hi of Northern Persia, and proving that most nomads from the Mediterranean to the Caspian belonged to this secret religion. Then dogmas of the religion were set forth as obtained from three sources, namely, (1) Account of renegade Suleiman; (2) Studies amongst the Ali-ullah-hi; and (3) Researches amongst Ansaree of Tarsus.—Rev. E. F. Wilson read a few 'Notes on some North American Indians.'—In a paper entitled 'A Contribution to a Scientific Phrenology,' Mr. B. Hollander presented the result of further investigations into brain-functions (the first series of which has been published in the Journal of the Anthropological Institute of August, 1889), showing again a striking similarity between modern experimental researches and the observations made by the founders of the phrenological doctrine. The centre for visual perception and ideation (first occipital convolution), considered by some physiologists to be the centre for the "concentration of attention," corresponds with the localization of "concentrativeness" by G. Combe. Mr. Herbert Spencer, who in the Zoist, vols. i. and ii., published his phrenological observations, considers the area, which Dr. Gall noted to be connected with visions and hallucinations, to be the centre for the revivification of ideas, which in its unnatural actions is accompanied by a difficulty in distinguishing revived impressions from real perceptions. The localization is the same as Dr. Ferrier's centre (12), the excitation of which causes such movements of eyeballs and heads as are "essential to the revivification of ideas." Excitation of the third and fourth external convolution in jackals and cats is accompanied by retraction of the ear, a sudden spring or bound forward, opening of the mouth, with vocalization and other signs of emotional expression, such as spitting and lashing the tail as if in rage. Dr. Gall located in the same area the "carnivorous instinct," termed "destructiveness" by his followers, and considered by Prof. Bain to be merely another name for the irascible emotion. Though the investigations are by no means finished, Mr. Hollander expressed the hope that an examination of his two communications to the Institute may induce scientists to reconsider the antiquated system of phrenology, which has hitherto failed to recommend itself to the scientific world.

HISTORICAL.—June 19.—Mr. Hyde Clarke, V.P., in the chair.—The following paper was read: 'The Expulsion of the Jews in 1290,' by Mr. G. H. Leonard.—A discussion followed, in which Messrs. O. Browning, H. Haines, G. Hurst, R. Lloyd, W. Moore, Rev. R. Thornton, and the Chairman took part.

HELLENIC.—June 23.—Annual Meeting.—Sir C. Newton, V.P., in the chair.—Prof. Jebb was elected President of the Society in place of the late Bishop Lightfoot.—Messrs. J. B. Bury, A. E. Haigh, F. Haverfield, H. Babington Smith, and R. Elsey Smith were appointed to fill vacancies on the Council.—The former vice-presidents and other officers were re-elected.—The hon. secretary (Mr. G. Macmillan) read the report on the part of the Council. In pursuance of the policy indicated in last year's report, the Council has thought it wise this year also to refrain from extraordinary expenditure. The result has been to show once more a substantial balance, which should enable the Society to make in the ensuing session occasional grants in aid of exploration and excavation. Deep regret was expressed at the death of the first president of the Society, the late Bishop of Durham. On his decease Sir C. Newton was appointed under Rule 22 to act as president until the annual meeting. The Council have now nominated Prof. Jebb to the vacant office. Passing reference was made to two other eminent members lost by death in the past year, Mr. R. Browning and Mr. J. T. Wood, the untiring excavator, who restored to light the temple of Diana at Ephesus. Lack of adequate funds prevented Mr. Wood from carrying out this important work so completely as he would have desired. Turning now to the work of the session, the Journal of Hellenic Studies naturally claims the first notice. Vol. x., which was published complete, is fully equal to its predecessors, both in text and illustrations. The promise held out in last year's report of rendering accessible to members copies of various series of photographs taken in Greece by amateurs has been fulfilled. Catalogues have been issued of photographs taken by the following members of the Society: Messrs. J. T. Clarke, W. Covington, L. Dyer and M. Macmillan, W. Leaf, and R. E. Smith. Complete sets of these photographs are on view in the library. It is hoped that in course of time other collections may be turned to account in the same way. Mr. Stillman has allowed enlargements to be made of some very beautiful photographs taken by him in Sicily. These will shortly be issued by the Autotype Company at the same rate as the well-known series of Athenian photographs, together with a selection from Mr. Leaf's Greek views, which he has placed at the disposal of the Society. If these are well received it is hoped that enlargements may also be produced of some of the best prints in the other series referred to above, and possibly of some more of Mr. Stillman's views of Athens, the negatives of which are in the hands of the Society. This important part of the Society's work is engaging the constant attention of a special committee appointed by the Council. It has been arranged that the Autotype Company shall pay to the Society a royalty on all copies of the enlargements sold to the general public. A small addition to the Society's income may therefore be looked for from this source. The grant of 100*l.* to the British School at Athens, originally made for three years, has been renewed for one year only, not with any intention of withdrawing further support, but in order that the case may be considered on its merits year by year. The session now drawing to a close has been the most successful that the School has yet held. Besides the work in Cyprus, which has been devoted to the site of Salamis, the School, by arrangement with the Greek Government, undertook excavations on the site of Megalopolis, and has already laid bare great part of the plan of the theatre. For both these projects further funds will be required next season. Two of the students, Messrs. Schultz and Barnsley, have again been devoting themselves to the neglected subject of Byzantine architecture in Greece, with results likely to be of the highest value. Comparatively little has been spent this year upon the library, as no regular sum is set apart for the purchase of books. The Council do not feel justified in spending much in this department unless it is shown to be the wish of the Society at large. The treasurer's accounts show ordinary receipts during the year of 74*l.* compared with 810*l.* during the financial year 1888-9. The subscriptions show a falling off of 13*l.*, and the receipts from libraries and for back volumes a decrease of 26*l.* Excepting for a trifling decrease of 6*l.* in respect of arrears, receipts from other sources were stationary. A donation of 100*l.* has been made by Mr. James Vansittart. The advance made some years ago towards the cost of reproducing the Laurentian MS. of Sophocles has been entirely repaid, leaving to the credit of the undertaking some 19*l.*, with three copies still on hand. In the matter of ordinary expenditure, the increasing value of the stock of Journals and of the library has necessitated an increase of 8*l.* in respect of insurance, while the expenditure on the library has been limited to 2*l.* for binding. Stationery and printing show a reduction of 6*l.* The cost of the Journal has been reduced, it being published complete instead of in two parts. The total ordinary expenditure has, therefore, been 636*l.* as against 686*l.* The loan of 100*l.* borrowed from the bankers in 1888-9 has now been repaid, and the financial year, which began with a balance at the bankers' of 42*l.*, closes with an effective balance in favour of the Society of 150*l.* 19*s.* This balance remains after deducting the grant of 100*l.* to the School at Athens, which, by an oversight, was not paid until after the close of the financial year. Arrears of subscriptions are due to the amount of 165*l.*, towards which 45*l.* have been received since the balance sheet was made up. Since the last annual meeting fifty members have been elected and the Society has lost fifty. The present total of members (including twenty honorary members) is 674. The report concluded with a statement of the importance of increasing the number of members.—On the motion of the Chairman, seconded by Mr. F. W. Percival, the report was unanimously adopted.—Mr. E. Gardner, Director of the British School at Athens, read parts of a paper on recent archaeology in Greece, which will be published in the next number of the Journal of Hellenic Studies.

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.

Mon. Geographical, 8*½*.—Explorations in Cilicia Trachea, Asia Minor, Mr. J. Theodore Bent.
Wed. Entomological, 7.
Tues. Archaeological Institute, 4.—Roman Antiquities of Augsburg and Rastatt, Prof. B. Lewis; 'Keys of St. Peter at Liège and Maestricht,' Mr. E. W. Beck.
Fri. Geologists' Association, 8.—Notes on the Geology of the Long Excursion to the Mendip Hills, Rev. H. H. Wainwood and Mr. H. B. Woodward.

Science Gossip.

MR. BENT is going to read a paper on the district of Olba and his other explorations in Cilicia Trachea before the Royal Geographical Society on Monday. The Geographical Club will entertain Mr. Stanley on Thursday next at dinner at the Grosvenor Gallery.

WE believe that Mr. F. E. Beddard, Mr. W. Hatchett Jackson, the present Deputy, Prof. E. Ray Lankester, and Mr. E. B. Poulton are candidates for the Deputy Professorship (Linacre) at Oxford in the place of Prof. Moseley.

MR. H. H. JOHNSTON, whose return to England we announced a little while ago, is busily engaged on a work entitled 'David Livingstone and Central Africa,' for the series of biographies of "Great Explorers" published by Messrs. George Philip & Son. Some of the illustrations of the work in question will be from sketches taken by Mr. Johnston during his recent journey to Nyassa and Tanganyika.

WE have received the tenth edition of the late L. M. D. Spence's Civil Service Geography (Crosby Lockwood & Son), edited by the late Mr. Thos. Gray, C.B., one of the assistant secretaries to the Board of Trade. The index to this little book of 168 small pages contains 4,500 names!

FINE ARTS

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.—THE ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTEENTH EXHIBITION IS NOW OPEN. —5, Pall Mall East, from 10 till 6.—Admission, 1s.; Catalogue, 1s. ALFRED D. FRIPP, R.W.S., Secretary.

The LEGEND of the BRIAR ROSE, painted by E. BURNE JONES, A.R.A.

The LEGEND of the BRIAR ROSE.—The EXHIBITION of Mr. BURNE JONES'S Four Pictures is NOW OPEN at Messrs. Thos. Agnew & Sons' Old Bond Street Galleries, 39, Old Bond Street, W.—Admission, 1s. 10 to 6 o'clock. Saturdays, 10 to 5.

IVAN AIVAROVSKY.—A Collection of Thirty large and important MARINE PAINTINGS, by this well-known Russian Artist, now ON VIEW at the Goupil Galleries, Bond Street, Valadon & Co., 117, New Bond Street.—Admission, 1s.

THE NEW SALON.

THE opening of the doors of the Société Nationale excited great curiosity among the Parisian public, and the tide of fashion having decidedly set in that direction, it soon came to be considered the correct thing to proclaim the infinite superiority of this exhibition over that in the Champs Elysées. As regards this eulogium, allowance must, of course, be made for a large amount of infatuation. There is undoubtedly a considerable number of remarkable works at the Champ de Mars, which, however, would have attracted as much notice had they been hung in the Palais de l'Industrie. But by the side of these undeniably fine productions, there is a proportion of mere "filling-in" which almost equals that of the rival Salon. The galleries of the Champ de Mars have received no fewer than 1,409 works, out of which 911 belong to painting alone. The sculpture has 100 numbers only. The rest come under the head of drawings, water colours, pastels, and etchings. According to the regulations of the new exhibition, the works of the members of the Society were admitted without a preliminary examination; those of other artists were submitted to the judgment of a committee performing the functions of a jury. This committee has shown itself extremely indulgent, and was doubtless more impressed than need be by the vastness of the galleries it was its office to fill.

The exhibition is installed on the first floor of the Pavillon des Beaux-Arts of the International Exhibition of 1889, but some changes have been made in the internal arrangements of the building. By removing some of the old partitions, two long galleries have been formed which, with the addition of a few small rooms, constitute the whole domain of the present exhibition. The pictures are extremely well hung, and they do not reach to the ceiling in such a manner that one must needs break one's neck to see them. This and other improvements, as well as the liberty given to artists to exhibit as many works as they like, constitute decidedly favourable conditions for painters of talent. On the other hand, pictures of an inferior kind do not escape criticism so easily as in the Champs Elysées, where they were lost in a motley crowd. At the same time one is forcibly struck with the extraordinary diversity of views, of method, and of impressions which painters bring to bear on their rendering of nature. Is this because we live at a time when analysis holds a more important place than synthesis, and when most minds incline to anarchy? Or is it simply because there is no personality strong and brilliant enough to radiate light far around it? However this may be, I am bound to say that if in our day there are French artists of talent, there is, properly speaking, no French school. When one sees side by side, and almost without intermediary shades, such men as Meissonier and Puvis de Chavannes, Carolus-Duran and Roll, it is impossible to admit that masters who conceive beauty and æsthetic truth in such totally different ways should have an equal right to admiration. Admitting that there is for the critic a very real enjoyment in this diversity—I should say incoherence, were the word not disrespectful—one cannot wonder if the public, which understands simple ideas only, is astonished and dismayed by it.

M. Meissonier indisputably holds the first place in the exhibition of the Société Nationale. His picture, Octobre, 1806 (No. 613), is one of the episodes of the Napoleonic epopee from which the painter has borrowed his subjects of late years. The Emperor, buttoned up in his legendary grey redingote and seated on a white horse, stands motionless on a small rise of ground whence he surveys the operations of a division of Cuirassiers which he has just ordered forth on to the plain of Jena. Behind him is seen a group of generals and officers in brilliant uniforms; in front of him three guides in red dolmans are on the watch, rifle in hand. M. Meissonier's peculiar qualities all shine forth in this work: his precision in drawing, his truthfulness in observation, and the art by which he produces upon a small canvas the impression of a great historic scene. The Emperor's staff, which is seen standing behind him, is superbly brilliant, and every personage in the group has its own marked and striking individuality. There is an extraordinary degree of life and movement in the charge of the Cuirassiers, but the figure of Napoleon is somewhat heavy and expressionless. For this reason, 'Octobre, 1806,' is to my mind inferior to the picture which the master has named '1814,' and which remains his undoubted masterpiece.

M. Puvis de Chavannes has sent in a single work, a great decorative panel called Inter Artes et Naturam (718), and intended for the staircase of the new museum of Rouen. Some figures, rather undefined in character, are grouped together in a large orchard; some are drawing, and others are studying fragments of broken statues. In the background the city of Rouen is seen. The silhouettes of the cathedral and of the church of St. Ouen stand out clearly against the sky. It is a fine and well-ordered composition, and there is much nobility in the attitudes of the figures. The colouring, as is usual in works of this master, is rather dull.

The contributions of M. Carolus-Duran show to great advantage. He has sent five pictures of ladies, four of which are full-lengths, a portrait of a man, and a female nudity—a back view. Her hair is red; she is seated on a cushion of red velvet before a red hanging which sets off her figure. This study of the nude is a fine piece of painting, and that is all there is to be said about it. The portraits are highly attractive, and their execution is most powerful. One of them (*Portrait de Madame *, No. 183) represents a lady dressed in red velvet and wearing a fur mantle on her shoulders; the neck and the arms are bare. She is standing erect, and is placed against a background of reddish brown. Another is the portrait of a young girl (Portrait de Mlle. S., 179) in walking costume; her dress and hat are of a grey hue, and she wears a sash and silk cravat of tender rose. These two canvases are, thanks to their arrangement, the firmness of the modelling, and the brilliancy of the colour, works of the first class.—M. Roll appears to me less happily represented than he has been at the three previous exhibitions. The woman with the bull and the Norman farmer's wife, which we saw at the Universal Exhibition of last year, and his contributions to the Salon of 1889, differed altogether from his previous work both in sentiment and execution. He now appears to have returned to his old manner, and has readopted in the Portrait de Madame Jeanne Hading (763), that of Coquelin Cadet (764), and in L'Enfant avec sa Bonne (768), the somewhat heavy touch and the black tone of which he appeared to have got rid. The change in this direction is still more perceptible in the Étude sur la Seine en 1889 (767); and in Mer Funèbre (771). The artist appears to have taken realism for reality, which is by no means the same thing.

M. Lhermitte has sent a large work and some cabinet pictures. The former is a panel destined for the decoration of one of the halls of the Commissions of the Faculty of Science (Sainte Claire Deville, 577). It is a picture of a chemist in his laboratory in the midst of his pupils. The artist dealt with a similar subject last year. The two pictures ought to make a pair. The one exhibited this year is remarkable. The figures are very carefully modelled and painted, the lighting is extremely true and most frank, and free from the papillotement for which the artist has been often blamed. The cabinet pictures represent scenes in rural life, where the figures are placed in the full blaze of a hot summer's day: Repos des Moissonneurs (578), La Soif (579), Les Foins (580). These three canvases are exquisite.—M. Duez has this year a beautiful piece of genre, Le Café sur la Terrasse (309). On the seashore, in front of a house built of brick which stands in full sunlight, a woman seated at a table drinks a cup of coffee, while her husband reads a newspaper and her children play on the sands. The scene of domestic life is acutely conceived, and treated in a large style. The full-length portrait of the grandson of Victor Hugo (Portrait de Georges Hugo, 308) is a cold and rather dull work. It may be that this is the fault of the model.

M. Gervex has introduced into the editorial room of the République Française newspaper (402) the chief editors. M. Spuller, M. Challe-mel Lacour, M. Jules Roche, M. Waldeck Rous-seau, and M. Joseph Reinach are grouped round a table, some of them seated, the rest standing. The portraits are good likenesses, but a little heavily treated. The brilliancy which M. Gervex has imparted to some of his previous works is not to be found in this one. There is more originality, and yet a little mannerism, in a portrait of the painter by himself, Mon Portrait (404).—The contribution of M. Israël, Jeunes Filles de Zandvoort allant à la Criée (495), is altogether black.—M. Artz, while imitating the manner and the methods of M. Israël, has put more light into his view of an interior, entitled La Petite Ménagère (19). The attitude of the child, who is occupied in peeling potatoes beside an old woman, is appropriate, and is the chief element in this picture of an episode in the life of the poor by its true feeling. In L'Attente (20) the figure of a wife of a fisherman sitting on the seashore stands out against the ashen-grey sky in a very fine fashion.

M. Friant's contributions are both varied and important—three portraits, two landscapes, and three popular scenes. La Lutte (374) depicts, in a landscape which shows no great originality, but a true illumination, lads preparing to bathe in a little stream. Two of them have seized one another, and are trying to throw one another. The modelling and colour are excellent. The Portrait de M. B. (379) is of good quality.—M. Stevens has sent eleven pictures. La Jeune Veuve (839) is in a pretty, but in a rather flinching taste. Réverie (841), Une Musicienne (842), La Lettre (849), are elegant compositions, finely touched, but a little insipid, and without any great relief.—M. Béraud has grouped the crowd pressing round a gaming table at Monte Carlo with great brio and talent in Rien ne va plus! (57). Under the title of Étude (58) he has amused himself by painting a naked woman enveloped in a black but most transparent veil; the effect is more singular than agreeable.

M. Guignard is represented by ten canvases. A peasant occupied in milking a cow (La Laitière, 447), and a young girl walking towards us down an avenue of old trees, in which the light is broken by the foliage (Retour de l'Église, 448), are a little heavy in drawing, but the sentiment is sufficiently powerful.—M. Besnard exhibits those variations upon green and yellow of which the composition and the subject are equally mysterious; and M. Boldini has arranged a marvellous series of full-length, life-size figures. Both artists have their admirers; M. Besnard has even received from the Municipal Council of Paris the commission for a ceiling in the Hôtel de Ville.

M. Dagnan Bouveret with his three pictures, Portrait de M. S. (233), Cimetière de Sidi Kebir (234), and Bords de Rivière (235), is hardly likely to repeat the great success he obtained at the Salon of last year. He is a little overlooked.—M. Lerolle exhibits two large pictures of a decorative character, intended for a church—Saint Martin donne la Moitié de son Manteau à un Pauvre (569), and Jésus-Christ apparaît à Saint Martin (570), fine compositions, but rather coldly executed. On the other hand, there is a great deal of poetry and sentiment in his two landscapes, Soir (571) and Bord de Mer (572). The last recalls the manner of Harpignies.

The landscape painters are not numerous, but Les Blés (238), Dans les Dunes (239), and La Pointe de l'Île Saint-Denis (244) of M. Damoye; Un Jardinier à Montrouge (84) and Le Soir (86) of M. Victor Binet; two seascapes of M. Mesdag's, Avant l'Orage (623) and Marée Haute, Plage de Scheveningue (623); a sunset effect athwart trees, a work of genius by M. Saintin, Soir d'Hiver (799), and the landscapes of southern scenes by M. Montenard, deserve to be studied.

Sculpture is pretty nearly absent. Among some statues rather lost amid the vast galleries which precede the galleries of paintings, I only see the Modèle de la Statue de Victor Noir (1255), by M. Dalou, which is worth mention.

To conclude, the exhibition on the Champ de Mars is highly respectable, and it contains, besides some works that are really remarkable, a sufficiently large number that are interesting. But there is no use trying to deceive oneself. They are not the productions of a single year. Not only have the artists been allowed to exhibit as many works as they pleased, but they have been permitted to include among their contributions some works which have already figured in private exhibitions. The exhibition, then, is in some degree retrospective. This is a fact not to be forgotten if one desired to compare it with the Salon of the Champs Elysées.

FERDINAND DUVAL.

SALES.

MESSRS. CHRISTIE, MANSON & WOODS sold on the 16th and 17th inst. the following drawings by T. M. Richardson: Ullswater, 138*l.*; Durham, 140*l.*; Mont Blanc, from the road between Cluice and Sallanches, 76*l.*; Looking towards Glencoe, from Rannoch Moor, 367*l.*; Looking down the Lake of Como, from above Bellaggio, 59*l.*; Looking towards Bellaggio, from Baveno, 57*l.*; Evening, Loch A'an, Grampians, Aberdeenshire, 231*l.*

The same auctioneers sold on the 21st inst. the following pictures: D. Mytens, Portrait of a Youth, 126*l.*; F. Hals, Portrait of the Artist's Wife, 1,837*l.*; Sir H. Raeburn, Portrait of Mrs. Eleanor Bethune, 861*l.*; Sir J. Reynolds, Lady Anne Dawson as Diana, 199*l.*; Portrait of Miss Rush, 110*l.*; R. Cosway, Mrs. Casamayor (Elizabeth Helen), daughter of Sir James Campbell, 525*l.*; N. Maes, Prince Rupert, with dogs, 105*l.*; Anonymous, Sir Anthony Wingfield, half length, 110*l.*; W. Van de Velde, A Calm, with man-of-war and boats, 178*l.*; J. Van Goyen, An Extensive Landscape, with figures and cows, 178*l.*; H. Keller, A Pair of Pastoral Scenes, 120*l.*; F. Boucher, The Muse of History, 294*l.*; Madame de Pompadour, 215*l.*; Lancret, A Fête Champêtre, 325*l.*; Giorgione, A Lady and Child, of the Morisoni family, 194*l.*; J. Ruysdael, A Road Scene, with cottages and figures, 162*l.*; A Sea View, with figures on a wooden jetty on the left, 1,102*l.*; Murillo, The Immaculate Conception, 399*l.*; M. Mierevelt, A Gentleman, in a black robe, with white ruff and wristband, 147*l.*

The same auctioneers sold on the 23rd inst. the study in oil of Salisbury, by J. Constable, for 147*l.*

At the sale of M. Crabbe's collection, which we noticed partially last week, 'Le Matin,' by Corot, brought 63,000 fr., and 'Le Soir,' 60,000 fr.; 'Le Guide,' by Meissonier, 177,000 fr. and 'Le Billet-doux,' 43,500 fr.; a 'Holy Family,' by Rubens, 112,000 fr.; and a portrait by Frank Hals, 46,500 fr. The Brussels Museum purchased 'Les Pourceaux' of Paul Potter for 32,200 fr. Nattier's portrait of Madame de Flesselles fetched 75,000 fr.

Fine-Art Gossip.

THE Annual Report of the Trustees of the British Museum has been published, and, in addition to matters already communicated to our readers, states that the number of persons visiting the Bloomsbury and South Kensington sections was, in 1885, 584,660; in 1889, the next high number, 504,537; of these 361,046 went to Cromwell Road. Not more than 2,467 persons entered on Monday and Saturday evenings from 6 till 8 o'clock between May 4th and July 15th, and from 6 till 7 o'clock between July 20th and the end of August, 1889, all inclusive. 190,025 persons went to the Reading Room in 1889, the highest number quoted, besides 14,524 who used the Newspaper Room. It is said that 20,747 went to the Gold Ornament and Gem Room in 1889, and 4,850 to the Print Room. The electric light installation cost 8,842*l.*, and includes, besides the Reading Room with its five large arc lamps and six in the courtyard, 128 arc lamps and 644 glow lamps. The evening visitors in the alternate evenings of February, March, and April last were, on an average, 635, 367, and 297 per evening respectively. If these numbers do not increase it will prove that it is not worth while lighting the Museum. Mr. Colvin reports on behalf of the Print Room the continued preparation of indexes and catalogues, and the rearrangement of examples and references to them in older catalogues required by the recent removal of the collections. Among the works in question is a new and improved classification of early Italian engravings, and the continued preparation of a final catalogue in accordance with the same, the rearrangement of the general collection of Dutch and Flemish etchings, and the final arrangement of Classes II. to VIII. of the English portraits. Nearly five thousand prints and drawings were acquired during 1889.

The Society of British Artists will open to the public on Monday next its Summer Exhibition of sketches, studies, and decorative designs, to which we have already alluded as a novelty likely to be of value. The private view is appointed for to-day (Saturday).

NEARLY the whole of the scaffolding having been removed from the North Porch, Westminster Abbey, as reconstructed after the design of Sir G. Scott, it is now easy to estimate the character of the new work. A fine piece of design in itself, it is infinitely better than the inartistic additions to the neighbouring side of Westminster Hall.

WE are glad to hear that, in the opinion of several architects experienced in the treatment of ancient buildings who have been called in to survey the gatehouse of Lincoln's Inn, it is not in a dangerous state, and may easily be put into sound repair. This destroys the only argument that Lord Grimthorpe has been able to produce in favour of its destruction. He and his friends have tied up the front with iron inch gas-piping, which seems to show that they do not themselves believe it to be dangerous.

THE annual meeting of subscribers to the British School at Athens will be held at 22, Albemarle Street on Wednesday next at 4.30, Lord Savile in the chair. The usual reports will be read by the managing committee and the director, and accounts will be given of the recent excavations at Megalopolis and at Salamis in Cyprus by the students who took part in them. All persons interested in the work of the School at Athens or of the Cyprus Exploration Fund are invited to attend.

THE Corporation of Leeds, who now own Kirkstall Abbey, have called in Mr. J. T. Micklethwaite to advise them as to the steps to be taken for the preservation of the ruins. It is time something was done, for some of the most interesting parts are in a dangerous state.

THE Building News, a journal not generally opposed to "restoration" in its milder forms, writes thus of some recent performances:—

"Owing to some carelessness on the part of the workmen engaged, a portion of the refectory wall of Kirkstall Abbey has been demolished. It appears that men in the employ of the Leeds Corporation have for some time been occupied in pulling down a number of trees that had grown within the walls of the abbey. Their instructions were to remove them piecemeal, and in a number of cases this had been done with safety. On Saturday, however, it was found that an elm which stood near the wall dividing the monks' refectory from the open court was rotten, and, curiously enough, it was decided by those in charge of the operations, as there was a clear space in which it would fall, to pull it down bodily. Unfortunately, the anticipation was not realized; and the tree, in its descent, carried away half of one of the refectory windows and a portion of the wall. It is a matter for regret that since the remains of this beautiful Cistercian abbey have come into the possession of the Leeds Corporation it should have suffered serious injuries, not only from the depredations of roughs, but during the process of removing ivy from the walls and trees from the enclosure. No 'restoration' can replace the walls in their old condition, and this is a case in which the unremitting vigilance of all interested in the protection of ancient buildings should be exercised."

So say we; and we congratulate the Society for Protecting Ancient Buildings on this signal instance of success in "educating" an able professional organ of opinion into the right path. It is due to our contemporary to add that, whatever might have been said with regard to Mr. Five per Cent., the Building News has always denounced the mischievous pranks of Lord Grimthorpe at St. Albans and elsewhere.

NEW Battersea Bridge, which replaces the old wooden structure dear to artists and dangerous to inexperienced rowers, will be opened for traffic in the course of next month. It is a fairly satisfactory design, and, apart from the raising of the road on the north end, which materially injures the neighbourhood of Cheyne Walk, is not unwelcome. It has cost at least 250,000*l.*, and, being largely of iron, will require constant repainting. The timber bridge, which cost 22,500*l.*, was badly designed for modern use, and need not have been dangerous; it was built a hundred and fifty years ago, and cost little for repair, because it was very easy to replace a decayed pile with a new one and no under-water foundations were required. We understand that Cheselden, the great surgeon, who is buried in the neighbouring graveyard of Chelsea Hospital, designed old Battersea Bridge.

WE have to record, with much regret, the death on the 20th inst., in the sixty-eighth year of his age, of Mr. Robert Henry Soden Smith, museum keeper of the Art Library at South Kensington, a post which, with advantage to students and honour to himself, he held during many years. In this office his many accomplishments, excellent taste, and eminent courtesy distinguished him. The library grew large under his charge, and he never failed in zeal and good judgment in increasing, arranging, and cataloguing it. He compiled, or directed the compilation of, those classified lists of books according to their subjects published by the Art Department, of which students have not as yet attained full knowledge. Besides many contributions to art periodicals, he wrote the letterpress to 'The Treasure of Petrosia,' 1869, and 'Corporation and College Plate,' 1869. He was the son of Capt. R. Smith, of Dirleton, Haddingtonshire, Athlone Pursuivant-at-Arms. Educated at Trinity College, Dublin, he was originally intended for the Church, but his taste for bibliography and archeology growing strong with successful studies, he entered South Kensington about thirty years ago, and by successive steps rose to the post he filled so long and well.

THE French School are excavating in the Eparchy of Troezen, and report the discovery of the remains of an ancient temple and of some sculptures.

ON continuing the excavations of the tumulus on the plain of Marathon where they were left by Dr. Schliemann, the Director of Antiquities at Athens has discovered, at the depth of more than 12 mètres, an urn of terra-cotta containing the remains of a corpse. The urn is evidently older in character than the Persian wars, and around it are arranged other tombs, as in the tumulus at Velanideza and at Vourvâ, so that we may conclude it to be the burial-place of a family or phratia. Remains of a Roman tower have come to light, but none as yet of the trophy mentioned by Pausanias.

AT Paromythia, in Epirus, a Latin inscription in honour of Sextus Pompeius has been found, which shows that to be the site (hitherto uncertain) of the city of Photiké.

AMONGST the sculptures from the temple of Despoina now removed to Athens, there is a figure resembling the Jupiter of Otricoli in the Vatican Museum, which will prove of great value by throwing light on the relation between the art of Phidias and that of Damophôn.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul.'
ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—'Le Prophète.'
ST. JAMES'S HALL.—Richter Concerts.

SUCCESSFUL as was the performance of 'Elijah' on the Handel orchestra at the Crystal Palace last year, we are inclined to regard that of 'St. Paul' last Saturday as superior, if possible. Considering that there had been no rehearsal of the combined force, which consisted of the London contingent of the Handel Festival Choir, four hundred choristers from Bristol, five hundred boys, and an orchestra of about three hundred, the clockwork precision and homogeneity which were maintained throughout the performance were little short of marvellous. That 'St. Paul' is more suitable for rendering on this colossal scale than 'Elijah' there cannot be two opinions. Its broad, massive choruses, like those of Handel, gain by the number of executants brought to bear upon them. In his admirable essay on the history of the work "G." says that the attempts to place Mendelssohn's earlier oratorio on a level with the later have never been successful. 'St. Paul' "is full of earnestness, divination of character, deep religious feeling, spirit, nobility, and diverse musical treatment; but it has not got the style which its composer had acquired by the time that he wrote the 'Lobgesang.' In this respect, if the parallel may be pardoned, the work may be compared somewhat with the 'Mount of Olives' in Beethoven's career." Surely this is an overstatement of the case. There is very little of the true Beethoven in 'The Mount of Olives,' but, with the exception of the chorales, there are few numbers in 'St. Paul' on which the Mendelssohnian stamp is not engraven with a distinctiveness which makes error as to their authorship almost impossible. As to return to last Saturday's performance: the rendering of the choruses was not only superlatively fine as regards the volume of sound and the unswerving accuracy of the vast force, but the quality of tone was remarkable for its purity and richness. The shrill voices of the boys were, perhaps, a little too prominent in "Sleepers, wake," but in the other numbers in which they took part the effect was decidedly pleasing. Mr. Manns has been strangely accused of taking some of the choruses too slowly in order to maintain precision, but there is no ground whatever for the charge. The late Sir Michael Costa used to accelerate the tempo in "O great is the depth" far more than the composer's directions warranted; but last Saturday the metronome marks, be their value great or little, were most closely observed. Little need be said regarding the soloists. Mr. Watkin Mills sang the principal part with much expression, and his voice travelled well. Madame Albani and Madame Patey were both in excellent voice, and the same may be said of Mr. Lloyd, who made his first appearance since his return from America. Messrs. R. Grice and H. Bailey were competent as the two false witnesses. Mr. Manns was, of course, recalled and heartily cheered at the close of the performance, and no conductor on any occasion more richly deserved this stereotyped compliment.

It may be said of Meyerbeer's 'Le Prophète' that, unlike 'Les Huguenots,' it does not play itself; that is to say, neither the subject nor the music is sufficiently interesting to render a performance effective with only a moderate cast. Two artists of the first rank are absolutely necessary for the rôles of Jean of Leyden and Fidès, or the opera is dull and tedious. As two such performers are now available in the persons of M. Jean de Reszke and Mlle. Richard, Mr. Harris may receive thanks for reviving 'Le Prophète' after an interval of seven years. For this purpose the Covent Garden score of the work, which had been ruthlessly mutilated by Sir Michael Costa and other conductors, has undergone revision, and the present version is unquestionably an improvement upon that of former years, though much of the opera is necessarily sacrificed, the part of Berthe being still cut down to insignificant proportions. From a popular point of view perhaps such a proceeding would be unwise, but we should like the silly skating ballet eliminated in order that other portions of the work might be restored. However, it would be hypercritical to cavil at the present performance, for it is certainly equal to the best that has ever been witnessed since the work was produced in 1849. M. Jean de Reszke may not be superior to Mario in his prime, but he is not inferior to him in any respect, and Mlle. Richard is immeasurably superior to Madame Viardot in the quality of her voice. The Polish tenor's rendering of the hymn "Roi du ciel et des anges" is one of the finest vocal efforts within our experience, and in the cathedral scene the splendid voice, fine presence, and noble histrionic art of Mlle. Richard combine to produce an impression not quickly to be effaced. While these great artists retain their powers 'Le Prophète' cannot fail to be a popular opera. The rest of the representation is, on the whole, of great excellence. MM. Montariol, Miranda, and Édouard de Reszke are admirable as the three Anabaptists, M. Cabalet is competent as Oberthal, and Mlle. Nuovina fairly satisfactory as Berthe. The fine scenery painted for the original performance has been renovated, and Mr. Harris has been at pains to make the performance effective as a spectacle. Now that the opera is given in the original French language it would be well to revise the English translation which accompanies it in the book of words, but which by no means corresponds with the opposite pages of the book.

The Richter Concerts seem to be particularly in favour with the public this season, St. James's Hall being again crowded on Monday evening. There were three Wagner selections, the first being the trio of Rhine Daughters from 'Götterdämmerung,' which was well sung by Miss Anna Williams, Miss Fillunger, and Miss Lena Little. It does not, however, make a particularly effective concert-room piece, both voices and orchestra being too much en évidence, and the scenic background being needed to produce the required impression. How Mr. Lloyd sings the Preislied from 'Die Meistersinger' every amateur knows, and it is equally unnecessary to describe the rendering of the Liebesduett from 'Die Walküre' by Mr. Lloyd and Miss Anna Williams. Brahms's 'Tragic' Overture and Liszt's so-called symphony to Dante's 'La Divina Commedia' were both magnificently played; and if anything could reconcile us to the latter rhapsodical and unsatisfactory work, it would be the interpretation under Herr Richter. Despite a few extremely fine passages, however, the Dante symphony is ugly and incoherent as a whole, and it does not improve on acquaintance. The programme of the Wagner concert next Monday has been improved, the early symphony being removed in favour of further selections from the operas.

Musical Gossip.

SEÑOR SARASATE's last concert for the present season at St. James's Hall last Saturday presented no features calling for criticism. Max Bruch's Concerto in D minor, No. 2, and Dr. Mackenzie's 'Pibroch' Suite were the Spanish violinist's principal solo efforts; and the purely orchestral items were Mendelssohn's 'Italian' Symphony and Mr. Cusins's overture 'Les Travailleurs de la Mer.' During his recent visit Señor Sarasate did not play either the Beethoven or the Mendelssohn concerto—a sufficient proof that his position with the public is not subject to ordinary conditions, for the rush to hear him was as great as ever.

Two more pianists have appeared since our last notice. Herr Eduard Zeldenrust, who gave a recital at the Steinway Hall on Monday afternoon, is a young Dutchman about twenty years of age. In any ordinary season amateurs would have welcomed him gladly, for he is an executant of very high calibre. The principal items in his programme were Beethoven's 'Waldstein' Sonata, of which he gave a remarkably intelligent reading, and Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in A minor, as transcribed by Liszt; but he was equally thoughtful and pleasing in smaller pieces by Schumann, Chopin, and other composers.

HERR ERNST DENHOF, who appeared at the Princes' Hall on Wednesday, is a performer of moderate calibre. His rendering of Beethoven's Sonata in D minor, Op. 31, No. 2, was flurried and incorrect; later on he improved, and played some items by Schumann fairly well.

HERE SCHÖNBERGER also gave a pianoforte recital on Wednesday at the Steinway Hall, and was heard to great advantage in Beethoven's sonata 'Les Adieux,' &c.; Schumann's Sonata in G minor, Op. 22; some pleasing pieces by Volkmann, &c.

M. SAPELLNIKOFF's second recital at St. James's Hall on Tuesday afternoon served to show that the Russian pianist is a somewhat unequal player. He commenced remarkably well, his rendering of Beethoven's Sonata in E flat, Op. 81, 'Les Adieux,' &c., being marked by vigour without exaggeration, while that of Haydn's Variations in F minor was delightfully pure and delicate. Pieces by Mendelssohn and Chopin were played in a rougher and more commonplace fashion. A Romance and a 'Humoresque' by Tschalkowsky proved to be charming little pieces. Madame Sophie Menter joined M. Sapellnikoff in Liszt's so-called 'Concerto Pathétique' for two pianos, a grotesque and extravagant work, without redeeming features of any kind.

On the same afternoon, at Dudley House, Mr. Wilhelm Ganz gave his annual concert. The vocalists who assisted him in miscellaneous, but for the most part high-class programme, were Mlle. Zélie de Lussan, Miss Georgina Ganz, Madame Patey, Madame Sterling, and Messrs. Lloyd, De Soria, Ben Davies, Norman Salmond, Lawrence Kellie, and Isidore de Lara. The most important items in the programme were Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in C minor with string quintet accompaniment, and Beethoven's Quartet in E flat, Op. 16.

BRAMH'S Pianoforte Quartet in C minor and Mozart's rarely-heard Quintet in C were the leading items in Messrs. Ludwig and Whitehouse's third concert at the Princes' Hall on Tuesday evening. Very good performances were secured, the concert-givers being assisted by Miss Zimmermann and Messrs. Collins, Gibson, and Heydrich. Miss Fillunger contributed songs by Brahms and Schubert.

A HIGHLY creditable concert was given by the pianoforte and vocal pupils of the London Organ School at the Princes' Hall last Saturday evening. In cases of this kind it is generally invidious to particularize, and we shall, therefore, merely say that with nearly all the young pianists the evidence of sound technical instruction was particularly noticeable.

MUSICIANS will be glad to learn that a performance of 'Fidelio' will be given shortly at Covent Garden, with Madame Tavaré as Leonora, should circumstances permit.

THE plans of the new Mozart theatre to be erected on the Mönchsberg, at Salzburg, have been completed by the architects, Herren Helmer and Fellner. The interior will somewhat resemble that of the Bayreuth theatre, with, however, the addition of a gallery. A new serpentine road is to be constructed from the town to the eminence on which the theatre is to be built.

THE Italian journals continue to pay much attention to Mascagni's opera 'Cavalleria Rusticana,' which has excited such enthusiasm in Rome. According to L'Epoca, Verdi requested the loan of the score, and after examination returned it to the composer with these words, "Now I can die happy!" Probably this story is merely the fruit of a fertile imagination.

CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK.

- Mon. Signor Vittorio Carpi's Concert, 3, Steinway Hall.
 — Mr. Cuthbert Quilter's Matinée, 3, No. 74, South Audley Street.
 — Signor Carlo Ducci's Matinée Musicale, 330, No. 14, Ovington Square, S.W.
 — Miss Amy Flood Porter's Violoncello Recital, 8, Steinway Hall.
 — Rhythmic Concert, 830, St. James's Hall.
 — Royal Italian Opera.
 Tues. Mrs. Carlisle Carr's Concert, 4, No. 22, Old Bond Street.
 — Miss Eino Sontag's Pianoforte Recital, 8, Steinway Hall.
 — Royal Italian Opera.
 Wed. Mr. J. M. Thomas's Concert, 3, St. James's Hall.
 — Miss Amelia Van Brugh's Violin Recital, 3, Steinway Hall.
 — Post Office Conversations, 7, South Kensington Museum.

- WED. Royal Italian Opera, 7.30. 'Die Meistersinger.'
 — Welsh Concert, 8, St. James's Hall.
 THURS. Mr. Isidore de Lara's Concert, 8, St. James's Hall.
 — Royal Italian Opera.
 — Mr. J. M. Coward's Concert, 8, Steinway Hall.
 FRI. The Countesses Augusta and Ernesta d'Ochseppe's Vocal and Piano Recital, 330, Colford & Colford's Concert Rooms.
 — Royal Italian Opera.
 SAT. Mlle. Gabrielle Vaillant's Violin Recital, 3, Steinway Hall.
 — Mr. Borrow's Concert, 3, Princes' Hall.
 — Royal Italian Opera.

DRAMA

THE WEEK.

HER MAJESTY'S.—'Jeanne d'Arc,' Drame en Cinq Actes en Vers. Par P. J. Barbier.
 LYCEUM.—Revival of 'Nancy & Co.,' Comedy in Four Acts from the German of Paul Rosen. By Augustin Daly.

WHATEVER effect Madame Sarah Bernhardt may have created in Paris by her assumption of the rôle of Jeanne d'Arc in M. Barbier's heavy and old-fashioned piece, she has done nothing in the part to raise herself in the estimation of her English admirers. The play itself is dull and undramatic. The character of Jeanne is an historical study rather than a dramatic conception, and the whole offers few opportunities to the actress. It can scarcely be that Madame Bernhardt is jealous of the triumph of Mlle. Lia Félix, who, at the first presentation of the play at the Gaité sixteen years ago, won commendation as Jeanne. What other attraction she can have found in a play appropriately dedicated by the author to the memory of Ponsard, it is difficult to conjecture. Not more than three opportunities are afforded the actress, and of one of these, warned by a painful experience, she is wise enough not to take advantage. Her attitude in the first act, which is also the best, is now erect, instead of as formerly upon her knees; and the heroine as she is seen at her spindle in a simple and effective peasant's costume, or again listening to her "voices," and favoured with a not very impressive glimpse into celestial regions, has pathos, tenderness, and beauty, but no great inspiration. In the scene in which she recognizes the king, though hidden among his courtiers, and convinces him that her mission is divine, she surprises by the combined gentleness, womanliness, and simplicity of her style, but there is nothing ecstatic. From this time she becomes little more than a lay figure in a not very impressive pageant, and her success in the speech to Warwick of the fifth act depends rather upon the words than on the speaker. She recited with much vigour the lines, the modern application of which it is impossible to mistake:—

Je connais mon pays; il m'a donné son âme !...
 Il se redressera comme moi sous l'affront !
 C'est quand il est perdu qu'il relève le front !
 Faites, faites sur lui peser le joug des armes !
 Noyez-le tout entier dans le sang et les larmes !
 Reculez sa frontière, ivre de vos succès !
 La France renaitra dans le dernier Français !

The exquisite voice and the unequalled charm of personality combated sometimes with success the dullness of situation and language. The militant character of Jeanne, however, disappears, and the influence she exercises over the soldiery is not easily to be understood. When in the first act she disarms Siward, an English soldier, opposing to his sword the feeble guard of a sickle, her defence is obviously divine. The "Dieu des guerriers" is on her side, and the ponderous weapon of her adversary drops as by magic. Nothing in her action, however, justifies the surprised declaration of Siward, "Mais c'est une lionne !" The chief attribute of the performance is beauty, and in showing us this Madame Bernhardt favours us with no revelation. There is little that is effective in the pageantry. The consecration in Rheims Cathedral is wholly unimportant and unimpressive, and the firing of the funeral pile even has no element of terror. It is due to M. Barbier to say that one or two important situations are omitted in representation. For Agnès Sorel in the second act is substituted another mistress of Charles named Yseult. The object of this change is not apparent. The music, by M. Gounod, is familiar to musicians. Such interest as it possesses is very slightly connected with the play.

Another farcical comedy which has previously been seen in London has been revived by the Augustin Daly Company. Concerning 'Nancy & Co.' nothing new requires to be said. It is laughable and trivial. As a means, however, of displaying to advantage the powers of an admirable company it is worthy of all praise. So much charm of vitality and coquetry has Miss Rehan that she grows upon the spectator, and her very mannerisms are in the end accepted as part of a delightful personality. Mr. Drew, Mr. Lewis, Mrs. Gilbert, and other actors are seen to thorough advantage, and the entire company displays admirable ensemble. Some little horse-play there is, but this is readily condoned in the amusement that is created.

THE GREEK PLAY AT BRADFIELD COLLEGE.

IT is one more proof of the keen interest that the present generation feels in recalling the life of the past that a large audience should assemble in a chalk pit in Berkshire to witness a performance of the 'Antigone' under conditions approximating, as far as circumstances permitted, to those under which it was enacted in ancient Greece. The experiment was a decided success. The daylight, and above all the absence of the footlights and other concomitants of a modern theatre, and the provision of an orchestra which enabled the chorus to assume its proper place, gave a wonderful air of reality to the scene, and helped the spectators to a better understanding of the tragedy than most of them, at any rate, possessed before.

The Warden of Bradfield College deserves great credit for arrangements that must have cost both labour and money. He wisely refrained from attempting a pedantic reproduction of archaeological details: he eschewed masks and the huge soles of the couthurn, nor did he attempt to limit himself to three actors, and Creon, although said to be the tritagonist, entered by the central door. Also very wisely, Mr. Gray chose his company entirely from among the masters and boys of the school. Of course the adequate presentation of such characters as Creon and Antigone would tax the powers of the greatest of actors; but these being unobtainable, the performance had a much more genuine character as it was than if the aid of outsiders had been called in. The actors had been well drilled and knew their parts extremely well, the aid of the prompter being very seldom required. The Creon of Mr. Wade was an especially meritorious effort to play an extremely difficult part; and the Antigone of Mr. Blagden, the Ismene of Mr. Maconochie, and the Tiresias of Mr. Prentiss were worthy of much praise, and so, in a less degree, were the representatives of Eurydice and Hæmon. The two messengers were extremely well played by Mr. Ingram and Mr. Green. Mr. Guy's Sentinel was clever, but laid too much emphasis on the paltry side of the character, Mr. Guy omitting, for instance, to throw any touch of pathos into the beautiful lines:—

ἡ παῖς ὁρᾷται, κἀνακικνέει πικρὰς ὀρνίθους ὅξιν φθόγγον, ὡς ὅταν κενὴς εὐνὴς νεοσσῶν ὀρῶντ' ἀνὰ βλέψῃ λέχος·

As masks were wisely dispensed with, it might have been as well to depart still further from Greek usage and allow the faces of the attendants to show some interest in the progress of the play, and the members of the chorus might also with advantage have indulged in some by-play. Warm praise is due to the ability and energy displayed by Mr. Gray as the Corypheus. The music was a trifle austere, and it might have been as well to put a little more of the exultation of victory into the parodus. The dramatic intensity of the play arrested the attention of the audience from the opening εὐφημείε of Mr. Gray till the last anapaests of the exodus died away as the chorus disappeared from view among the trees overhanging the parodus. The whole spectacle was really beautiful. The charming situation of the chalk theatre, the graceful lines of the amphitheatre, the smoking altar, the judiciously decorated stage, and the tasteful dresses of the performers, formed a delightful whole, which, on such a fine afternoon as that of Tuesday last, could not fail to fascinate every spectator. It was a sight not to be easily forgotten.

MR. IRVING'S RECITAL OF 'MACBETH.'

A RECITAL of 'Macbeth' by Mr. Irving and Miss Terry, which has previously been given in various country towns, attracted to the St. James's Hall on Wednesday a large, an intellectual, and an appreciative audience. Mr. Irving and Miss Terry appeared in evening dress. To the latter was assigned the single character of Lady Macbeth, of which she gave what is practically an exposition. The remainder of the speaking characters, even to the female attendant in the sleep-walking scene, were taken by Mr. Irving. Music by Sir Arthur Sullivan was rendered by a competent orchestra, and aided somewhat in the accomplishment of the difficult task of conveying the idea of twenty different characters. To render absolutely and at all times distinct so many separate individualities is a task beyond human effort. In presenting the more prominent characters, however, Mr. Irving was happy, and his Macduff may be esteemed almost a creation. As is but natural, the greatest effect was obtained in the well-known scenes: in the delivery of the dagger speech, in the address to Duncan, in the banquet scene, and the like. Many, however, of the less important characters stood out with great clearness. Some new readings of Mr. Irving attracted observation, and his entire conception of the play is, perhaps, more fully grasped at a recital than at a performance. Miss Terry's conception of Lady Macbeth gains also in significance from her reading of the part. An eminently intellectual and suggestive entertainment was received with warm favour.

Dramatic Sossipy.

THE practice of performing dramatic novelties at private houses has spread from Paris to London. 'Vanity of Vanities,' a duologue by Mr. Justin Huntly McCarthy, has thus been played during the present week at Mrs. Campbell Praed's. It is a curious and interesting story of modern life dealing with the malady of weariness of life, is written with much brightness, will be publicly seen on Friday next, and is likely to find its way on to the regular stage. Miss May Whitty and Mr. Herbert Waring played the two characters, the Princess Nicholas and Morris Hastings, with much distinction.

MR. ISAAC HENDERSON, the American novelist, has written a play founded on his novel 'Agatha Page,' which will be produced at the Haymarket by Mr. Beerbohm Tree at a matinée in the autumn.

AN attractive programme has been finally arranged for the Marlowe Memorial benefit at the Shaftesbury Theatre next Friday afternoon, and the changes made in consequence of the withdrawal of the new comedy by Mr. H. A. Jones seem to enhance the interest of the entertainment. We have already announced Mr. Courtney's new dramatic sketch, entitled 'Kit Marlowe'; a new duologue by Mr. J. Huntly McCarthy; Mr. Daly's adaptation of Sheridan's 'Trip to Scarborough,' entitled 'Miss Hoyden's Husband,' to be performed for the first time in England by Miss Ada Rehan and other members of the Daly Company; and a recitation by Madame Sarah Bernhardt. In addition to these items, Mr. Willard will recite in costume Rossetti's 'A Last Confession'; Miss Letty Lind will dance; Mr. Ben Davies will sing; Miss Maude Millett and Mr. George Giddens will recite; and Mr. George Alexander and the members of the Avenue company will give the second act of 'Dr. Bill.' The funds of the Marlowe Memorial should benefit by this lavish list of attractions. Seats can be booked at the Shaftesbury Theatre.

In a miscellaneous entertainment given at the Avenue on Tuesday 'Art and Love,' a delicate one-act comedy by Mr. A. W. Dubourg, was well played by Miss Wallis, Mr. Herbert-Basing, Mr. A. Stirling, and Mr. H. A. Saintsbury; and 'Punchinello,' a one-act play by Dr. Dabbs, was presented by Mr. W. H. Vernon, Mr. Bassett Roe, Mr. Webster, and Miss E. Robins.

At the expiration of Mrs. Langtry's tenure of the St. James's Theatre with the close of the year, the management of the house will pass into the hands of Mr. Alexander.

MISS FANNY JOSEPHS (Mrs. Wombwell), whose death has been announced, imported into the lightest order of performance a delicacy and grace that are not common upon the stage. She made her début under Phelps at Sadler's Wells, where, on September 8th, 1860, she played Celia in 'As You Like It.' Her name also appears to Perdita, Ida Stralenheim in 'Werner,' and to Marion de l'Orme in 'Richelieu.' The following year she was at the Strand, and she subsequently played at the Holborn, the Globe, the Prince of Wales's, and other theatres. Her performance of a young nobleman in 'Flying Scud' and her Lady Sneerwell in 'The School for Scandal' are favourably remembered.

MR. WILLARD has, we understand, obtained a prolongation of his tenure of the Shaftesbury, and 'Judah,' the merits of which have gained slow but sure recognition, will not consequently have to be withdrawn. Miss Wallis's resumption of management will be deferred until the autumn.

FEODOR LÖWE, who was connected with the Stuttgart Theatre for some fifty years, has just died. He used to be considered the best representative of Hamlet on the German stage. Löwe made himself also a name as a poet through his 'Gedichte' and his masonic poems entitled 'Den Brüdern.' His sister was the celebrated singer Sophie Löwe, who appeared in London in 1841, and married in 1848 an Austrian prince.

THE NEXT WEEK'S NOVELTIES AND REVIVALS.
THU. Strand (Afternoon), Revival of Milman's 'Fazio.'
Globe (Afternoon), Production of 'Vera.'
THURS. Criterion (Afternoon), Benefit Performance.
Toole's (Evening), 'The Solicitor.'
FRI. Shaftesbury (Afternoon), Marlowe Memorial Performance.
SAT. Criterion (Afternoon), Production of 'Papa's Honeymoon.'
(Evening) Revival of 'Sowing and Reaping.'

(These announcements are subject to changes of plan on the part of managers.)

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—A. L. T.—W. R.—T. C.—received.
H. J.—We cannot undertake to answer such questions.
No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION BY POST.

					s.	d.
For Twelve Months	15	3
For Six Months	7	8

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

READY ON THE 28th INST.

HENRY M. STANLEY'S GREAT BOOK.

In Darkest Africa.

Being the Official Publication recording the QUEST, RESCUE, and RETREAT of EMIN,
Governor of Equatoria.

The Illustrations, numbering over 150, have all been made from Mr. Stanley's own Notes, Sketches, and Photographs.

There are three large Maps and fourteen smaller ones.

ORDINARY EDITION, 2 vols. demy 8vo. of over 500 pp. each, in handsome cloth binding, price TWO GUINEAS.

EDITION DE LUXE of 250 copies all sold.

NEW NOVELS AT ALL THE LIBRARIES.

JACK ABBOTT'S LOG: a Yarn of the Merchant Service. By ROBERT BROWN, Author of 'Spun yarn and Spindrift,' 'Jack's Yarn,' &c. 2 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, 21s.

The HOUSE on the SCAR: a Tale of South Devon. By BERTHA THOMAS, Author of 'Proud Maisie,' 'Cressida,' &c. 1 vol. crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

The WAY OF TRANSGRESSORS.

By E. RENTOU ESLE. 3 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, 31s. 6d.

"A pleasant, casual story, sufficiently moral in its aim, full of gossip and detail... A decidedly good novel, marked by much quiet power and grace."—Athenæum.

THE CONSPIRATOR: a Romance of Real Life.

By Count PAUL P. Edited by FRANK HARKUT. 2 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, 21s.

"The book is vividly written and abounds in excitement of various kinds."—Athenæum.

NEW SPORTING WORK.

The SCIENTIFIC EDUCATION of

DOGS for the GUN. By H. H. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.
Contents:—"The Rationale"—Kennel Management—Retrievers—Pointers and Setters—Spaniels.

LOW'S STANDARD LIBRARY OF TRAVEL.

The HEART of AFRICA: being

Three Years' Travels and Adventures in the Unexplored Regions of Central Africa. By Dr. GEORG SCHWEINFURTH. New Edition. With Map and numerous Illustrations. 2 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d. per volume.

TWO KINGS of UGANDA; or, Life

by the Shore of the Victoria Nyanza. Being an Account of a Residence of Six Years in Eastern Equatorial Africa. By ROBERT F. ASHE, M.A. F.R.G.S. F.R.H.S., &c. New and Cheaper Edition. With Map and Illustrations. Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

Now ready, price ONE SHILLING.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

JULY NUMBER.

Contents.

THALIA: a Poem. Thomas Bailey Aldrich.
PORT TARASCON: the Last Adventures of the Illustrious Tartarin II. Alphonse Daudet. With 24 Illustrations, drawn by Luigi Rossi, F. de Myrbach, &c.

A FAMOUS CHAPBOOK VILLAIN. Illustrated. Howard Frye.

A POETESS: a Story. Mary E. Wilkins.
SOME COLONIAL and REVOLUTIONARY LETTERS. Frederick Daniel.

The MOONLIGHTER of COUNTY CLARE: a Story. Jonathan Sturges.

ARCHITECTURE and DEMOCRACY. Robert S. Peabody.

TEXAN TYPES and CONTRASTS. Lee C. Harby. 17 Illustrations.

SOCIAL LIFE in OXFORD. Ethel M. Arnold. 8 Illustrations. From Drawings by Joseph Pennell, &c.

TREASURY NOTES and NOTES on the TREASURY. L. E. Chittenden.

TWO LETTERS: a Story. Brander Matthews.

BALTIC RUSSIA. Henry Lansdell, D.D. 9 Illustrations. &c. &c.

70 ILLUSTRATIONS in ALL.

London:

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON, SEARLE & RIVINGTON
(LIMITED),
St. Dunstan's House, Fetter-lane, Fleet-street, E.C.

3, '90

CO.'S

EAT

g the MIN,

ll been Photo-

ones.
r 500 pp.
EAS.

RIES. of the uthor of
2 vols.

Tale uthor of cloth, 6s.

ORS.
cloth, of gossip power and ce of FRANK of various

N of
th, 6s.
nt—Re-

VEL. being explored
WEINnumerous
ed. per

Life
ccount
Africa.
S., &c.
rations.

N E.

ustrious rawn by Howard

TTERS.
Story.
eabody.
y. 17

s illus-SURY.

ations.

NGTON

, E.C.